The general rule as to costs is R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1, and the rules with regard to payment into court are to be found in Ord. 22. Though I do not think it affects the issue one way or the other, in 1948 the rules were altered, and there is no longer a provision for payment into court with a denial or admission of liability. Order 22, r. 1, provides:

"(1) In any action for a debt or damages or in an Admiralty action the defendant may at any time after appearance upon notice to the plaintiff pay into court a sum of money in satisfaction of the claim . . ."

By r. 6:

"Except in an action to which a defence of tender before action is pleaded or in which a plea under the Libel Acts, 1843 and 1845, has been filed, no statement of the fact that money has been paid into court under the preceding rules of this Order shall be inserted in the pleadings and no communication of that fact shall at the trial of any action be made to the judge or jury until all questions of liability and amount of debt or damages have been decided, but the judge shall, in exercising his discretion as to costs, take into account both the fact that money has been paid into court and the amount of such payment."

With regard to the issue as it arises under Ord. 65, r. 1, in an ordinary case between a successful plaintiff and an unsuccessful defendant, or the other way round, the matter was considered in Campbell (Donald) & Co. v. Pollak (1), and the main result of the opinions in that case was to cut down to some extent certain opinions expressed in this court attempting to codify the circumstances in which a successful litigant could be deprived of costs. On the other hand, VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., with whom two others of their Lordships agreed, and LORD ATKINSON, quoted with approval a statement of the matter taken from the judgment of LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., in Ritter v. Godfrey (2), the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., in which was criticised. The Lord Chancellor quotes the words of LORD STERNDALÉ, M.R., as follows ([1927] A.C. 809):

"This was a case tried without a jury before the judge alone, and therefore in the absence of an order by him neither party is entitled to any costs. It therefore differs from a case tried before a jury, where there is a statutory right to costs if there be no order to the contrary. But there is such a settled practice of the courts that in the absence of special circumstances a successful litigant should receive his costs, that it is necessary to show some ground for exercising a discretion by refusing an order which would give them to him. The discretion must be judicially exercised, and therefore there must be some grounds for its exercise, for a discretion exercised on no grounds cannot be judicial. If, however, there be any grounds, the question of whether they are sufficient is entirely for the judge at the trial and this court cannot interfere with his discretion. On the authorities as they now stand the line between cases tried before a jury and cases tried by a judge is very fine."

I am not certain whether the sentence "If . . . there be any grounds . . . this court cannot interfere . . ." is meant to apply to the circumstances where the judge gives leave to appeal, or is meant to apply to cases where no such leave is given. VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., expressed his approval of that passage, but he put it in this way (ibid., 811):

"A successful defendant in a non-jury case has no doubt, in the absence of special circumstances, a reasonable expectation of obtaining an order for the payment of his costs by the plaintiff; but he has no right to costs unless and until the court awards them to him, and the court has an absolute and unfettered discretion to award or not to award them. This discretion, like any other discretion, must of course be exercised judicially, and the judge ought not to exercise it against the successful party except for some reason connected with the case."

The first point to be decided here is whether a defendant who has paid money into court which has not been taken out and exceeds the sum awarded to the plaintiff is a successful litigant or a successful party within those two statements of the law. I hold that he is, and that the principles there laid down apply. The main purpose of the rules for payment into court is the hope that further litigation will be avoided, the plaintiff being encouraged to take out the sum paid in, if it be a reasonable sum, whereas, if he goes on and gets a smaller sum, he will be penalised wholly or to some extent in costs. Once, therefore, the money has been paid in, the lis between the parties simply is: Is that sum sufficient to cover the damage which has been suffered. Prima facie, therefore, the defendants in the present case are entitled to be paid their costs as from the date of payment in, but, of course, as in other cases, there may be circumstances connected with the case which entitled the judge to make some order other than that of giving the successful litigant his costs, and counsel for the plaintiff submitted that there were such circumstances in this case. [HIS LORDSHIP referred to the submissions of counsel and the facts on which they were based, said that there were no circumstances entitling the judge to deprive the successful defendants of their costs, and concluded:] If I am right in holding that the defendants in the circumstances of this case are the successful litigants or parties then, on what I have read from the opinion of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in the House of Lords, the learned judge went wrong in principle, and his order cannot stand, and this appeal must be allowed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. Counsel for the plaintiff urged that, on the authorities, we should not interfere with the learned judge's exercise of his discretion unless either there was no material on which he could have reached the conclusion he did, or it was plain on the evidence and from his judgment that he had gone wrong in principle in reaching that conclusion. I think that on both grounds we are bound to interfere.

In the present case money had been paid into court in an action in which, owing to an admission of liability, the only issue was quantum. The plaintiff did not accept the money so paid in and recovered less than the amount paid in. In these circumstances, counsel for the plaintiff suggests that there are three possible orders which the learned judge might make, (i) that the defendants should recover costs after the date of payment in; (ii) that no order as to costs after that date should be made; and (iii) that the plaintiff should recover the costs of the whole action. It is, I think, as my Lord has said, a proper inference from the terms of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 6, that the normal order in a case where liability is admitted, the only issue is quantum, and the plaintiff recovers less than the amount paid in, would be that the first of the three courses I have mentioned should be adopted and the defendants should recover the costs incurred after the date of payment in. Brown v. New Empress Saloons, Ltd. (3), shows that in a proper case there should be no order as to costs after the date of payment in, but counsel was unable to refer us to any case where the third course had been adopted. I do not find it necessary to decide whether it can ever be right to make the defendants pay the costs after the date of payment in, but I think it could only be where there was something in the conduct of the defendants which justified the plaintiff in proceeding to trial. No such conduct is suggested here—indeed, as counsel for the defendants pointed out, the defendants appear to have behaved with complete propriety throughout.

In my opinion, therefore, there was no material to support the learned judge's judgment. I think he went wrong in principle. His attention, as my Lord has said, was not expressly directed to Ord. 22, r. 6. When the discussion as to costs began, after counsel had said: "I would invite your Lordship to say that this is in every sense a very proper case in which the defendants should have an order for costs as from the date of payment into court," BYRNE, J., said: "That is entirely within my discretion, is it not?" Counsel for the defendants endeavoured to suggest that there was, at any rate, a definite way in which the discretion should be exercised, but counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the matter was entirely within the learned judge's discretion. I think that the proper inference from the discussion is that the learned judge accepted the latter submission, forgetting that under Ord. 22, r. 6, he was expressly directed to take into account both the fact that money had been paid into court and the amount of such payment. For these reasons I agree with the order proposed.

DENNING, L.J.: The learned judge gave leave to appeal on the question of costs, which is generally a matter for his discretion. The effect of giving leave is that the judge invites re-consideration by this court of his decision, and this court enters on a review of it with less hesitation than it would otherwise do.

In the present case I can well understand that the judge wanted to award the plaintiff her costs. A judge nowadays does not know what amount has been paid into court, and it is particularly galling for a judge, whose mind may have been fluctuating between £750 and £1,000, to find that because he chose the lower figure, the plaintiff not only gets merely that lower figure, but also has to pay much of it away in costs to the defendant. Knowing how close a thing it was in his own mind, he does not want a plaintiff to suffer because the payment into court happens to exceed the amount he awards. He would prefer not to take the payment into account, but the rules require him to do it.

The hardship on the plaintiff in the instant case has to be weighed against the disadvantages which would ensue if plaintiffs generally who have been offered reasonable compensation were allowed to go to trial and run up costs with impunity. The public good is better secured by allowing plaintiffs to go on to trial at their own risk generally as to costs. That is the basis of the rules as to payment into court, and I think we should implement them here, even though it means that the plaintiff has to pay out much of her damages in costs to the defendants. The only issue in the case was the amount of damages. The defendants paid a reasonable sum into court. The plaintiff took her chance of getting more, and, having failed, she must pay the costs. It must not be assumed, however, that, in allowing the appeal, this court is laying down a rule of law as to how a judge should exercise his discretion. We have no right to do that. It only means that in the present case, where the judge invited re-consideration of his decision, we think that, having regard to the rules as to payment into court, the plaintiff should be ordered to pay the costs from the date of payment in. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

RISK (otherwise YERBURGH) v. RISK.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), October 13, 27, 1950.]

Nullity—Polygamous marriage—Petitioner domiciled in England—Marriage in Egypt with Moslem domiciled in Egypt—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (c. 100), s. 1 (1), (2).

In 1938 the wife, an Englishwoman domiciled in England, went through a ceremony of marriage according to Moslem rites at Alexandria, Egypt, with the husband who was a Moslem by religion and domiciled in Egypt. According to the marriage contract, the husband was entitled to have more than one wife, but he had not, in fact, married a second time. The parties lived together in Egypt until June, 1946, when the wife left the husband and returned to England where she had since resided. It was established that the ceremony constituted a valid marriage according to the law of Egypt. On April 27, 1950, the wife petitioned for a decree of nullity on the ground that at the time of the ceremony, when she was domiciled in England, she was incapable of contracting a polygamous marriage, and, therefore, the marriage was void ab initio.

HELD: in spite of its extended jurisdiction under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) and (2), the court could not entertain a petition seeking relief from a polygamous marriage since a party to such a marriage was not entitled to an adjudication in accordance with the matrimonial law of England.

PETITION by the wife for a decree of nullity.

The wife went through a form or ceremony of marriage with the husband at Alexandria, Egypt, according to Moslem rites. The wife was then domiciled in England, and the husband, a Moslem by religion, was domiciled in Egypt. According to the marriage contract the husband was entitled to have two, three or four wives, but he had not, in fact, married a second wife. It was contended for the wife that the court had jurisdiction, by virtue of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) and (2), to grant the petition on the ground that the wife, being a domiciled Englishwoman at the time of the ceremony, was incapable of contracting a polygamous marriage which was, therefore, void. The suit was undefended. The facts appear fully in the judgment.

William Lathey, K.C., for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 27. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. The wife, Marjorie Elizabeth Risk, otherwise Yerburch, is praying the court to declare null and void a ceremony of marriage which was solemnised between herself and Abdul Hamid Mustafa Risk, the husband. The case was undefended.

On July 31, 1938, the wife, who was then twenty-one years of age, of the Christian faith and domiciled in England, went through a ceremony of marriage at Alexandria, Egypt, according to Moslem rites, with the husband who was a Moslem by religion and domiciled in Egypt. According to the marriage contract the husband was entitled to have two, three, or four wives at one and the same time, notwithstanding the opposition of the one with whom he is already united in marriage. The husband has not, in fact, married a second wife. After the ceremony the parties lived together in Egypt and there has been issue of this union one child, born on Dec. 23, 1940. In June, 1946, the wife left the husband because of his alleged ill treatment of her, and came to England with the child. In addition to the wife's evidence I heard that of Mr. Antonopoulos, an expert on Egyptian law, who satisfied me that the ceremony of marriage constituted a valid marriage according to the law of Egypt and that the certificate of marriage, now before this court, would be received in the Egyptian courts as prima facie evidence of such a marriage. He also satisfied me that a fundamental condition of the validity of the marriage, according to Egyptian law, apart from any question of form, would be governed by the national law of each of the parties thereto.

The case put forward on behalf of the wife is this—(i) that the court has jurisdiction by reason of s. 1 (1) and (2) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, and, (ii) having jurisdiction, that the wife, being a domiciled Englishwoman, at the time of the ceremony, was incapable of contracting a polygamous marriage, and, therefore, the marriage was void ab initio and, inferentially, void by Egyptian law.

As to the first point, the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) and (2), extends the jurisdiction of the High Court to proceedings by a wife for divorce or nullity of marriage notwithstanding that the husband is not domiciled in England, if (a) the wife is resident in England and has been ordinarily resident there for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings, and (b) the husband is not domiciled in any other part of the United Kingdom or in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. In the present case the wife has been resident in England for more than three years prior to the presentation of her petition, which is dated Apr. 27, 1950, and the husband is and always has been domiciled in Egypt. The question I have to consider is in what sense the terms "husband" and "wife" are used in this section.

LORD PENZANCE, in the course of his judgment in Hyde v. Hyde & Woodmansee (1), says (L.R. 1 P. & D. 133):

"But I expressed at the hearing a strong doubt whether the union of man and woman as practised and adopted among the Mormons was really a marriage in the sense understood in this, the matrimonial court of England, and whether persons so united could be considered 'husband' and 'wife' in the sense in which these words must be interpreted in the Divorce Act. Further reflection has confirmed this doubt, and has satisfied me that this court cannot properly exercise any jurisdiction over such unions."

In Srini Vasan (otherwise Clayton) v. Srini Vasan (2) and Baindail (otherwise Lawson) v. Baindail (3), all that the court decided was that a man who was domiciled in a country which permitted polygamy and had contracted a valid polygamous marriage in that country had the status of a married man according to the law of his domicile, and was, therefore, incapable of contracting a subsequent valid marriage in England, and in the latter case LORD GREENE, M.R., referred ([1946] 1 All E.R. 345) to the above quoted passage from the judgment of LORD PENZANCE and stated that, at any rate, rightly or wrongly, the courts have refused to regard a polygamous marriage as one which entitles the parties to come for matrimonial relief to the courts of this country. Marriage, as understood by English matrimonial law, according to SIR WILLIAM SCOTT in Lindo v. Belisario (4) (1 Hag. Con. 230), is a contract according to the law of nature, antecedent to civil institution, which may take place to all intents and purposes, wherever two persons of different sexes engage, by mutual consent, to live together, and, according to LORD PENZANCE in Hyde v. Hyde & Woodmansee (1) (L.R. 1 P.D. 133), marriage, as understood in Christendom, might be defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. Both definitions of marriage stress its monogamous character, and the matrimonial law of England recognises no other such marriage.

It seems to me to be clear, therefore, that, in spite of the extension of the jurisdiction under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, a petitioner cannot come to this court either to enforce the rights to or seek relief from a polygamous marriage, and, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in De Reneville v. De Reneville (5), I think that such a marriage, which is voidable, is also excluded from the jurisdiction of this court. Is such a marriage, which is void ab initio equally excluded?

If English law regards such a polygamous marriage as the one now before me as no marriage, it might seem at first sight that there could be no objection to the court saying so, for the decree would be declaratory. This would mean, however, that a successful petitioner would have the right to apply for maintenance and for custody, and this would also mean that if the present petitioner were the second, third or fourth wife of the husband the court would still have to entertain her petition, for under Moslem law the first wife is no more the wife than the remaining three. In the case now before me, although the ceremony was in Arabic, which language the wife did not understand, I am satisfied that she realised that it was a ceremony of marriage according to Moslem rites and that those rites permit of other wives. The wife entered into this marriage contract with a full knowledge of its polygamous character, and now on that very ground she seeks to have it set aside. On this aspect of the matter the words of LORD PENZANCE in Hyde v. Hyde & Woodmansee (1) are very much to the point. He said (L.R. 1 P. & D. 137):

“Is the court, then, justified in thus departing from the compact made by the parties themselves? Offences necessarily pre-suppose duties. There are no conjugal duties, but those which are expressed or implied in the contract of marriage. And if the compact of a polygamous union does not carry with it those duties which it is the office of the marriage law in this country to assert and enforce, such unions are not within the reach of that law. So much for the reason of the thing.”

LORD PENZANCE concludes his judgment in Hyde v. Hyde & Woodmansee (1) with these words (ibid., 138):

“All that is intended to be here decided is that as between each other they are not entitled to the remedies, the adjudication, or the relief of the matrimonial law of England.”

LORD GREENE, M.R., in Baindail (otherwise Lawson) v. Baindail (3) refers ([1946] 1 All E.R. 345) with approval to this passage. Although in Hyde v. Hyde & Woodmansee (1) LORD PENZANCE was dealing with a petition for dissolution,

I feel satisfied that he advisedly used the word “adjudication” and, therefore, this court has no jurisdiction to entertain this petition, and the petition must, accordingly, be dismissed.

Petition dismissed.

FULLER AND ANOTHER v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), Oct. 26, 1950.]

Revenue—Stamp duty—Voluntary disposition—Deed of declaration of trust made under power in earlier deed to vary trusts—Whether chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty—Stamp Act, 1891 (c. 39), s. 62—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (c. 8), s. 74 (1).

By s. 74 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910: "Any conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos shall be chargeable" on "the value of the property conveyed or transferred" with the same stamp duty as a conveyance on sale. By s. 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891: "Every instrument . . . whereby any property on any occasion except a sale or mortgage, is transferred to or vested in any person, is to be charged with duty as a conveyance or transfer of property . . ."

By a deed of declaration of trust dated Dec. 18, 1933, certain property was held on protective trusts for the benefit of H. during his life, and after his death on trust for his children or remoter issue as appointed, and in default of appointment for his children equally on attaining twenty-one, or being female, on marriage. The deed contained power for H., with the consent of the trustees, who had an absolute discretion to give or withhold consent, to appoint such new or other trusts of and concerning the trust fund or any part thereof as he might think fit. In exercise of this power, H., with the consent of the trustees, by deed of declaration of trust dated Nov. 12, 1947, directed that the trustees should raise the sum of £25,000 for his own benefit, and, subject thereto, that the trust property should be held as to each of two moieties on trust for each of two of his daughters for life and after the death of each in trust for her respective children or remoter issue as she should appoint, and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for her children. The Crown claimed ad valorem stamp duty on the value of the property (other than the £25,000) dealt with by the declaration of trust of 1947.

HELD: the declaration of trust of 1947 was an instrument whereby property was transferred to or vested in persons within the meaning of s. 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and was chargeable as a voluntary disposition inter vivos under s. 74 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

APPEAL from a decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that a deed of declaration of trust dated Nov. 12, 1947, was chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty as a "conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos" within the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 74 (1). The facts appear in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J.

Cyril King, K.C., and E. B. Stamp for the trustees.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

DANCKWERTS, J.: This is an appeal against a decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that a transaction dealing with property under a power exercised by a deed dated Nov. 12, 1947, in pursuance of two declarations of trust dated Dec. 18, 1933, and Oct. 28, 1942, attracts ad valorem stamp duty, the document in question being a "conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos" within the meaning of s. 74 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The declaration of trust of Dec. 18, 1933, was not a declaration of trust inter partes. It was a declaration of trust made by the present appellants as trustees of the trusts. The trusts declared, so far as is material, were that the trustees should hold the income of certain bonds and the sum of £53,150 "and the property for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called 'the trust fund') on protective trusts for the benefit of the Honourable Esmond Cecil Harmsworth the son of the settlor," during his life, and

"after the death of the son the trustees shall stand possessed of the capital and future income of the trust fund in trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children or remoter issue of the son" who should be appointed, and, in default of appointment,

"in trust for all his children or any child who attain or attains the age of twenty-one years or, being female, marry or marries, and, if more than one, in equal shares."

Clause 13 of that deed contained a power in these terms:

"The son may at any time or times hereafter with the consent in writing of the trustees (which consent they shall have an absolute discretion to give or withhold without giving any reason therefor or incurring any responsibility in that behalf) by any deed or deeds revocable or irrevocable appoint such new or other trusts of and concerning the trust fund or any part thereof as he may think fit."

The second declaration of trust, dated Oct. 28, 1942, merely added the sum of £800 in respect of the same trusts as the original declaration of trust.

E

By a deed made between the son of the settlor, the present Lord Rothermere, of the one part, and the trustees, of the other part, Lord Rothermere exercised that power which had been conferred on him by the original declaration of trust in the following manner. He directed that the trustees should raise a sum of £25,000 which was to be entirely for his own benefit, and, subject to the raising of that sum, he directed that the property remaining subject to the trusts of the principal deeds was to be held on trust as to one moiety for one of his daughters for life and after her death, as regards the capital and future income, for such one or more existing children or remoter issue as she should by deed or will or codicil appoint, "and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any of the children." The other moiety was directed to be held on trust for another daughter and for her life, and similarly on trust for her children or remoter issue after her death. That was a declaration of new trusts by virtue of the power contained in the declaration of trust of 1933.

At first sight a declaration of trust of that kind does not seem to bear any great resemblance to a conveyance or transfer, but I have to consider what the statute says. I find that in s. 74 (1) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910:

H

"(1) Any conveyance or transfer operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos shall be chargeable with the like stamp duty as if it were a conveyance or transfer on sale, with the substitution in each case of the value of the property conveyed or transferred for the amount or value of the consideration for the sale . . ."

As I have said, a mere declaration of trust does not, at first sight, seem to fall within that, but by s. 96 of the Act of 1910 that Act has to be construed with the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 62 of which provides:

"Every instrument, and every decree or order of any court or of any commissioners, whereby any property on any occasion except a sale or mortgage, is transferred to or vested in any person, is to be charged with duty as a conveyance or transfer of property: Provided that a conveyance or transfer made for effectuating the appointment of a new trustee is not to be charged with any higher duty than ten shillings."

This is a disposition, and the question is whether, by some artificial meaning which I have to give to the words in the Act of 1910, this disposition falls within the words contained in s. 62 of the Stamp Act, 1891. Some of the argument before me has been concerned with the question whether this power which Lord Rothermere exercised was a general or a special or limited power of appointment. It is clear that, for some purposes at any rate, it is, undoubtedly, a general power. That is established, it seems to me, by Re Dilke (1), and Re Phillips (2), in each of which cases the appointor could only exercise his powers subject to the consent of the trustees. It is true that in Re Watts (3), BENNETT, J., distinguished those cases where the consent to be obtained was not that of trustees but of a person who either was a present or a past tenant for life of the property concerned, but in Re Joicey (4) EVE, J., applied the earlier cases without any discussion of Re Watts (3). It is clear, I think, that in the present case this is a general power for many purposes although Lord Rothermere had to obtain the consent of the trustees of the settlement, but whether that is really the decisive point in this case is not clear to me. It is evident that this was a disposition, and what I have to consider is whether the effect of the disposition was to transfer or to vest any property in any person. What Lord Rothermere did was, not to transfer the investments which were the subject of the declaration of trust, but to alter the interest in those investments by changing the trusts contained in the original declaration of trust to new trusts which were declared by the appointment in the deed. It seems to me to be a highly artificial result to regard that as something in the nature of a conveyance or transfer in the ordinary sense of language. It appears, however, that Stanyforth v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5) is an authority which compels me to give the more artificial meaning to the nature of a disposition for the purposes of this statute. In that case there was an appointment under a joint power of revocation and new appointment contained in previous dispositions of the estates, and by the exercise of that power of appointment the interests of beneficiaries previously existing under the effective trusts or limitations were cut out and interests of other persons were accelerated. LORD WARRINGTON in that case said ([1930] A.C. 344) that he agreed with the Crown that the deed in question operated as a voluntary disposition inter vivos. It is true in that particular case that a further power of revocation was reserved and the interests of the persons who took under that exercise of power were reduced to a very small sum because of the possibility of those interests being defeated by a further exercise of the power, but it was plain that it was decided by the House of Lords—and was treated as being almost beyond argument—that the deed in question did operate as a voluntary disposition inter vivos. I am bound to follow that decision and to hold that in the present case there was a disposition operating as a voluntary disposition inter vivos, and, accordingly, that the claim to stamp duty on the amount of the property, other than the £25,000, which is treated by the Commissioners as not being the subject of duty, is well founded, and, therefore, the decision of the Commissioners must be upheld.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MAXWELL v. MAXWELL AND ANOTHER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Wallington, J.), October 11, 12, 1950.]

Variation of Settlement—Variation inimical to interests of children—Compensation of children—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 191 (1), s. 192.

- A The parties were married in 1940, and children were born in 1942 and 1943. In 1949 the marriage was dissolved on the husband's petition on the ground of the wife's adultery. The husband applied under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192, to vary a post-nuptial settlement asking that (i) the wife's rights, powers and interests in the husband's fund be extinguished as if she had died at the date of the decree absolute; (ii) the word "unmarried" be substituted for "a widower" in relation to the husband's life interest in the wife's fund after the death of the wife, so that the condition for the continuance of the interest would be that the husband should remain unmarried and not that the wife should have died; (iii) the husband be permitted to exercise his powers of appointment over his own fund in favour of the spouse and issue of any subsequent marriage of his during the lifetime of the wife; (iv) the wife's powers of appointment over her fund in favour of the spouse and issue of any subsequent marriage of hers be restricted to a husband married after the death of the husband and to children or issue of such second marriage born after his death. The husband also asked that, in order to compensate the children of the marriage for any loss which they might suffer owing to the variations asked for, the wife should be ordered, under s. 191 (1) of the Act of 1925, to settle £15,000 (or such sum as the court thought fit) of her unsettled moneys for the benefit of the children.

HELD: it was proper that the four variations should be made; variation (iii) was prejudicial to the interests of the children of the marriage and the children ought to be compensated; and the wife, who was the guilty party and had funds available, would be ordered to vest in trustees £5,000 or investments of like value to be held by them on trust to pay the income thereof to the wife during her life and after her death to hold the same as to both the capital and the income thereof on trust for the children absolutely.

APPLICATION for an order that a marriage settlement dated Mar. 17, 1941, and modified by a deed dated May 27, 1946, be varied.

- G The husband and the wife were married in 1940 and they executed a post-nuptial settlement dated Mar. 17, 1941. As modified by the deed of May 27, 1946, the settlement provided, by cl. 4 (a), that the husband's fund should be held on certain trusts for the benefit of the husband, the wife, and the issue of the marriage. By cl. 4 (b) the settlement provided:

- H "As to the wife's trust fund upon trust to hold the income thereof on protective trusts for the benefit of the wife during her life and after the death of the wife to hold the income on protective trusts for the benefit of the husband if surviving during the residue of his life but so long only as he is a widower or there are infant children of the marriage living."

Clause 4 (c) and (d) provided for the ultimate trusts of both the husband's fund and the wife's fund after the death or re-marriage of the survivor of the husband and the wife. Clause 5 provided that, notwithstanding and in derogation of the preceding trusts, it should be lawful for the survivor of the spouses by deed or will or codicil to make provision for a spouse and issue of any subsequent marriage of such survivor to take effect out of a certain proportion of the husband's fund if the husband should be the survivor or out of a similar proportion of the wife's fund if the wife should be the survivor.

There were two children of the marriage, born in 1942 and 1943. In July, 1949, the husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery. The decree was made absolute in September, 1949.

The husband applied for an order that the settlement (as modified) be varied, asking that (i) all rights, powers and interests of the wife in the husband's fund might be extinguished absolutely as if she had died at the date of the decree absolute; (ii) the word "unmarried" might be substituted for the words "a widower" in cl. 4 (b); (iii) the husband might be permitted to exercise the powers under cl. 5 during the lifetime of the wife; and (iv) the wife's powers under cl. 5 might be restricted to a husband married by her after the husband's death and to such children or the issue of such children of such marriage as might be born after the wife's death. The husband also asked (by leave, the application being made out of time) that, in order to compensate the children for any loss suffered by them as a consequence of the variations sought, the wife be ordered to settle for their benefit £15,000 (or such other sum as the court should think fit) out of her unsettled property under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 191 (1).

In his report, the registrar recommended that variations (i), (iii), and (iv) should be made, but he was not prepared to recommend that the wife be ordered to settle further property. The husband now applied to vary the registrar's report by directing that variation (ii) be made and ordering the wife to settle £15,000 or such other sum as the court should think fit for the benefit of the children of the marriage. In the course of the argument, counsel for the husband submitted that £5,000 was a reasonable sum to be settled by the wife.

WALLINGTON, J.: The registrar has reported the facts which he thinks are relevant and has, in the usual way, submitted a number of recommendations on the basis of which he suggests the variation of the settlement could properly proceed. The first recommendation which he makes is that the wife's rights, powers and interests in the husband's fund be extinguished as if she were dead. That is not, and could not be, opposed by anybody. It is an ordinary and proper order to make by way of variation of the settlement, and, accordingly, I adopt that recommendation in the registrar's report. The next recommendation is that the husband be permitted, during the lifetime of the wife, to exercise his powers under cl. 5 of the marriage settlement (the clause relating to the appointment of part of the husband's fund in favour of what I may call an "after-taken" wife and the children of a marriage with that after-taken wife). About that, if it stood alone, I should have no difficulty, because I think it would be just and equitable that those powers should be varied in the manner indicated in the recommendation. Counsel for the husband has also invited the court to vary cl. 4 (b) of the settlement by substituting the word "unmarried" for "widower" in that sub-clause and to make a consequential variation in sub-cl. (c) to provide (i) for the effects of the substitution of the one word for the other in cl. 4 (b), and (ii) for the rectification of some mistake or omission in the provisions of the trust. Such mistake or omission is, however, irrelevant to the matters before me.

Counsel for the wife has challenged that application on several grounds. It is also objected to by counsel appearing for the children on the same and one or two additional grounds—mainly on the ground that the interests of the children would suffer, although counsel for the husband argues that the only effect of the substitution would be to express what the parties must have intended when they made the settlement. It is not impossible, as I see it, that, if I made that variation in cl. 4 (b), it might prove to be inimical at some point of time and in some circumstances to the interests of the children. Counsel for the husband submits that a single matter of that sort ought not to be dealt with in isolation, but that the interests of the children should be one of the considerations taken in conjunction with all the considerations that affect a question of this kind.

A I think that that submission is a right one. My view is that the interests of the children must have a very high place, and in relation to some circumstances, perhaps, the highest place or priority, when the court comes to consider the application to vary in the several ways in which that application is framed.

I have indicated my view as to the second of the variations which the learned registrar has recommended. There is no doubt that the adoption of that recommendation will prejudice the interests of the children to the extent of any proportion of the trust fund that may be appointed by the husband under the power of appointment, as the proportion appointed will be taken out of the funds settled for their benefit. The settlement allows such an appointment after the death of one of the spouses, but the variation sought and recommended by the registrar would give the husband the right to appoint during the lifetime of

C the wife. It would only be by limiting in amount the proportion of the funds which could be so appointed that the interests of the children could to the extent of that limitation be preserved. The earlier the time at which the appointment could be made under cl. 5, the earlier would the children's interests be interfered with and the longer the period during which the income of the appointed portion of the funds would be removed from the children. That is a matter of considerable

D importance. Counsel for the wife presses me not to risk any further possible interference with the children's interests by substituting the word "unmarried" for the word "widower." It is agreed that the second recommendation in the report is bound up with this other application for variation, i.e., the substitution of one word for the other in cl. 4 (b).

E The conclusion at which I have arrived on this part of the case is that I ought to make the variation by the substitution of one word for the other, that being a matter affecting only the rights of the two spouses directly. It seems to me that the possibility of injury to the interests of the children arising out of that variation is so remote that I ought not to pay any serious attention to it now. This variation will involve further amendments in that part of the settlement of one kind or another, and to eliminate the possibility that any part of the funds, either income or capital, may be left for a period undisposed of the settlement must be varied as may be required for those purposes. If the parties can agree under competent

F advice as to the necessary amendments or variations, well and good, but, if they cannot agree or if there is any uncertainty in the minds of either of them, the variations for this purpose must be settled by one of the conveyancing counsel of the court.

G I come now to consider the effect of the second of the recommendations, i.e., the acceleration of the powers of appointment. Counsel for the husband has agreed that this variation calls for some protection of the children's interests and asks for an order that the respondent wife do settle securities up to £15,000 on herself for life and after her death for the children of this marriage on the trusts usual in such a case. That application is made under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 191 (1). I entertain no doubt that in a proper case such a settlement may be ordered and that it may be considered and dealt with at the same time as an application to vary the settlement. If it is just and equitable that the husband's powers of appointment should be accelerated, such acceleration will be inimical to the interests of the children. In my opinion, therefore, the children's position must be safeguarded.

H Would it be right for me for the purpose of providing such a safeguard to direct a settlement such as counsel for the husband invites me to order? If it is just and equitable and reasonable and proper that the husband's powers should be accelerated, and if, consequently, it is essential that something should be done for the protection of the children's interests, it cannot be right that the innocent petitioner should provide that protection. If it is to be provided it can only be provided out of the funds of the wife, if she has any. It has not been disputed that she has funds which can be made available for that purpose, and, in my opinion, part of them ought to be so used.

I adopt, therefore, and make an order in this case in accordance with, the recommendations of the learned registrar, viz. (i) that the wife's rights, powers and interests in the husband's fund be extinguished as if she were dead; (ii) that the husband be permitted to exercise his powers under cl. 5 of the settlement during the lifetime of the wife; (iii) that the wife's powers under cl. 5 of the settlement be restricted to a husband married after the death of the husband (the petitioner) and such children or issue as may be born after his death. I also, as I have said, order the variation of the settlement in cl. 4 (b) by substituting the word "unmarried" for the word "widower" with the consequential variations in cl. 4 (c), and, indeed, in any other portions of the settlement which may be affected and be capable of misunderstanding and fail in effect unless variations be made. On the application of the husband I order that the wife do vest in trustees the sum of £5,000 or investments to that value to be held by the trustees in trust to pay the income to the wife during her life, and after her death in trust both as to capital and income for the children of the marriage; and that a deed giving effect to this trust and to any consequential trusts as to the regulation of the income and the disposition and final disposition of the capital be settled by one of the conveyancing counsel of the court in the event of the parties failing to agree as to its terms.

Order accordingly. Costs of the trustees and the infant children and of the husband to be paid by the wife, in default to be paid out of the wife's fund.

CURTIS v. MALONEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), October 12, 13, 27, 1950.]

Execution—Sale by sheriff of goods seized—Title of purchaser—Rights of true owner—Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913 (c. 34), s. 15.

A sheriff, in execution of a writ of fieri facias, seized a motor cabin cruiser in the possession of the execution debtor, and sold it by public auction. The sale had been advertised and no claim was made to the vessel before the sale. It subsequently appeared that the cabin cruiser had, in fact, belonged to C., who claimed from the purchaser the return of the vessel or its value and damages for its detention.

Held: the proviso to s. 15 of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, could not be read so as to contradict and render meaningless the operative words of the section that the purchaser should acquire a good title, and, therefore, the purchaser was entitled to retain the vessel as against the former owner.

Decision of FINNEMORE, J. (ante, p. 201), affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of FINNEMORE, J., dated May 24, 1950, and reported ante, p. 201, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for the return of goods, sold by the sheriff by public auction and bought by the defendant.

- B In 1948 the plaintiff left a motor cabin cruiser in the care of boatwrights who subsequently got into financial difficulties with the result that a judgment was obtained against them. In execution of a writ of fieri facias against the boatwrights the sheriff of Essex seized the boat, and on Jan. 25, 1949, by the sheriff's order it was sold by auction, no claim having been made to the sheriff by any third party in respect thereof. On Feb. 25, 1949, the plaintiff claimed the return of the boat from the defendant, the purchaser, who relied on the
- C Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, s. 15. FINNEMORE, J., held that, on the true construction of s. 15 of the Act of 1913, the defendant obtained a title good against the whole world, and that the terms of the proviso to the section were to be construed as subject to the enacting part of the section, thus preserving to the plaintiff whatever rights he had by action other than against the sheriff and the purchaser. On appeal, it was contended for the plaintiff that,
- D since he had a title to the goods at the time of the sale, and since, apart from the section, he would have had a remedy against the defendant, and since the defendant was a person "other than such sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer as aforesaid," the proviso preserved his rights.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 27. The following judgments were read.

- F SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff claims in detainee for a motor cruiser known as Seahawk or its value £450. The defence with which we are concerned is under s. 15 of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, which reads as follows:

- G "Where any goods in the possession of an execution debtor at the time of seizure by a sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer charged with the enforcement of a writ, warrant, or other process of execution, are sold by such sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer, without any claim having been made to the same, the purchaser of the goods so sold shall acquire a good title to the goods so sold, and no person shall be entitled to recover against the sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer, or anyone lawfully acting under the authority of either of them, except as provided by the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883 and 1890, for any sale of such goods or for paying over the proceeds thereof, prior to the receipt of a claim to the said goods unless it is proved that the person from whom recovery is sought had notice, or might by making reasonable inquiry have ascertained that the goods were not the property of the execution debtor: Provided that nothing in this section contained shall affect the right of any claimant who may prove that at the time of sale he had a title to any goods so seized and sold to any remedy to which he may be entitled against any person other than such sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer as aforesaid."
- H

It was not disputed before us that at the time of the sale the Seahawk was the property of the plaintiff, and that it had been seized by the sheriff while in the possession of an execution debtor and sold by him to the defendant without any claim having been made. FINNEMORE, J., decided that the section afforded a good defence and the plaintiff appeals. The section must, of course, be construed as a whole.

Words in a proviso may affect not only the range but the meaning of words which precede the proviso: Jennings v. Kelly (1). It is submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that, as he had a title to the goods at the time of the sale, and as, apart from the section, he would have had a remedy against the defendant, and as the defendant is a person other than "such sheriff, high bailiff, or other officer as aforesaid," the proviso preserves his rights. He submitted that, if it had been intended to take away his right against the purchaser, the word "purchaser" would have appeared in the proviso after the word "such." There is clearly force in this argument. It leads to the question whether any meaning can be given to the words conferring a good title on the purchaser if he is liable to surrender the goods or their value to the person who is the owner at the time of the sale. Counsel suggested a case in which the true owner affirmed the sale by suing the judgment creditor for money had and received. In those circumstances it seems to me neither the purchaser nor a sub-purchaser from him would need the protection of the words in question. I do not think that any case was suggested which would leave the words with any content. Even, however, if such a case could be imagined, the effect of the section contended for, so far as a purchaser is concerned, is as follows: "the purchaser of the goods shall acquire a good title to the goods so sold except as against the owner at the time of the sale." This seems to me not to cut down, or give a restricted but possible meaning to the words "shall acquire a good title," but to contradict them. Although I am not sure that it affects the construction, the addition of the epithet "good," emphasises the impossibility, to my mind, of reconciling the construction put on the proviso with the words used earlier.

It was suggested at one time that the proviso might be construed as limited to remedies which the owner at the time of the sale might have (other than against the sheriff) in respect of acts done before the sale. It was, however, pointed out that such remedies are plainly not affected by the words preceding the proviso. It was also suggested, and there is, I think, some force in this, that the proviso might have been inserted to remove the possibility of argument that the right of the owner at the time of the sale to proceed against the execution creditor for money had and received had been affected by the provisions validating the sale. I do not think this suggestion gets over the difficulty of the absence of the word purchaser after "such." The only possible explanation of this that occurred to me, and I doubt if it helps, is based on the view that the words preceding the proviso "destroy" the right as against the purchaser but "affect" the right as against the sheriff, in that in certain circumstances that right will be effective, e.g., if reasonable inquiry might have disclosed that the goods were not the debtor's. On this basis the word "affect" is inapt to cover the purchaser who has been fully protected by being given a good title. I do not think one gets assistance from any known presumption of what Parliament may or may not have intended. Protection of purchasers for value without notice as against the legal owner is a principle well known in both law and equity. There is, I think, no presumption either for or against its extension.

I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right for the reasons which he gives. I agree with him that a good title can only mean a good title against everybody. I agree with him that the proviso cannot be read so as to contradict and make these express words meaningless by excluding from them the true owner at the time of the sale. It may be, as he held, that it is not necessary so to read it. If it is necessary, I would hold that the word "purchaser" must have been omitted by inadvertence after "such." For this reason I think the appeal should be dismissed.

A COHEN, L.J.: This case has been very well argued and I have felt considerable doubt as to the proper construction of the section. Counsel for the defendant contended that no effect would be given to the provision in the operative part of the section—that the purchaser of the goods sold should have a good title thereto—if we were to accept the argument for the plaintiff and hold that under the proviso the true owner could sue the purchaser in detinue. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the proviso would be meaningless unless we were to accept his argument, since, on the construction of counsel for the defendant, the only right that it was suggested that the proviso would cover would be a right of action for money had and received against the execution creditor, a right which counsel said would have subsisted equally well if the proviso had been omitted. Each counsel sought to cast doubt on the other's argument. Counsel for the plaintiff suggested that the operative part might assist the purchaser against a sub-purchaser alleging breach of warranty of title if the true owner had elected to affirm the sale and had sued the execution creditor for the proceeds of sale as money had and received. Counsel for the defendant suggested that doubt might have arisen from the operative part as to the right of the true owner to sue the execution creditor and that the proviso was inserted for removal of doubts.

D I cannot think that the draftsman was contemplating the event postulated by counsel for the plaintiff. The suggestion of counsel for the defendant is more probable, but ultimately we must abandon guesswork and return to the language of the statute and apply thereto the accepted rules of construction. Counsel for the plaintiff called our attention to Jennings v. Kelly (1) where the House of Lords considered the principles applicable to the construction of a section which contained a proviso. Counsel relied in particular on a passage from the speech of LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN where he said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 471):

E "I do not agree with the contention of the appellants, which appears in the second reason in their case: '... it is not a right method of construction to use a proviso to control or alter the operative effect of the words preceding it.' That is frequently the very function of a proviso—namely, to include within the scope of the preceding words something which prima facie would not fall within it, or to exclude something which prima facie would so fall. Although a proviso may well be incapable of putting upon preceding words a construction which they cannot possibly bear, it may without doubt operate to explain which of two or more possible meanings is the right one to attribute to them."

G Applying those observations to the present case, counsel said the proviso was plainly intended to exclude from the operation of the preceding words something which would otherwise be affected thereby. That thing was the right of the true owner to sue in detinue anyone but the sheriff, high bailiff or other officer. If it had been the intention of the draftsman to extend the protection given to the true owner to the purchaser, it would have been easy to say so—so easy, indeed, that the omission must be taken to be intentional.

H Counsel for the defendant, on the other hand, relied on what was said by LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 477):

"It is said that, where there is a proviso, the former part, which is described as the enacting part, must be construed without reference to the proviso. No doubt there may be cases in which the first part is so clear and unambiguous as not to admit in regard to the matters which are there clear any reference to any other part of the section. The proviso may simply be an exception out of what is clearly defined in the first part, or it may be some qualification not inconsistent with what is expressed in the first part. In the present case, however, not only is the first part of the section deficient in express definition, but also the second part is complementary and necessary in order to ascertain the full intention of the legislature. The proper course is to apply the broad general rule of construction, which is that a section or enactment must be construed as a whole, each portion throwing light, if need be, on the rest. I do not think that there is any other rule, even in the case of a proviso in the strictest or narrowest sense, and still less where, as here, the introduction of the second part by the word 'provided' is, in a strict sense, inapt."

Here, says counsel, the proviso is not an exception of what is clearly defined in the operative part, but merely a qualification not inconsistent with the first part. The first part gives the purchaser a good title and the qualification removes any doubt as to the preservation of the true owner's right against the execution creditor, a qualification not inconsistent with the good title remaining in the purchaser.

On the whole, though not without doubt, I think the argument of counsel for the defendant should prevail. It seems to me impossible on the construction of counsel for the plaintiff to give any real meaning to the provision that the purchaser shall acquire a good title. On the other hand, it might have been arguable but for the proviso that, as the purchaser had acquired a good title, an action by someone else as true owner, being a person from or through whom the purchaser did not derive title, must fail. I do not think that argument would have succeeded, but it seems to me more likely that the proviso was inserted to remove any doubts as to the rights of the true owner to sue the execution creditor for money he had received, than that it was intended not merely to cut down the protection given to the purchaser but to render it illusory. In the result I think the conclusions of the learned judge were right and the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This is yet another instance of a contest between the common law rule that no man can give a better title than he has got and the statutory exceptions in favour of innocent purchasers. I do not think we ought to whittle down the protection which Parliament has given to innocent purchasers. In a commercial community it is very important that their title should be protected.

The words of this section are clear beyond peradventure—"the purchaser shall acquire a good title", and I think they should be given their full effect. The proviso is to be explained by the anxiety of the draftsman not to deprive the original owner of his remedy against the execution creditor, or against any wrongdoer who had converted the goods prior to the sale. If it were not for the proviso, the execution creditor might have argued that the original owner's claim for money had and received was not preserved because the action for money had and received is only sustainable by a true owner who is claiming the proceeds in lieu of the goods themselves, and that it failed when he ceased to be the true owner. Any such argument, good or bad, is defeated in advance by the proviso. In my opinion, the section gives a good title to the innocent purchaser, and this appeal should fail.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Factory—Fencing—“Securely fenced”—Test—Fencing giving security from reasonably expected dangers—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 13 (1).

A By the Factories Act, 1937, s. 13 (1): “Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced.”

B A machine was guarded by a rail about four feet above the floor of a factory occupied by the defendants, but a pulley wheel, shaft and pinion were above this rail. A circular wire mesh guarded the pulley wheel, shaft and pinion, but only from a frontal approach, leaving the sides open, and there was a shelf about nine inches above the top of the pulley wheel. The plaintiff, a boy of seventeen employed by the defendants, placed a ladder against a rotating shaft which was at the top of the machine and above the shelf, and climbed up it to collect any material there might be on the shelf. The ladder began to slip sideways, and, in trying to clutch some means of support, the plaintiff received injury owing to his hand being crushed between the pulley wheel and the pinion. He claimed damages from his employers for breach of their statutory duty under s. 13 (1) to fence securely.

C HELD (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente): the test whether machinery was “securely fenced” within the meaning of s. 13 (1) was whether it was so fenced as to give security from such dangers as might be reasonably be expected. In the present case the machinery was securely fenced according to that test.

A

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of HILBERY, J., dated Apr. 17, 1950, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for breach of statutory duty. The facts are set out in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Hylton-Foster, K.C., and Denis H. Robson for the plaintiff.
Rawden-Smith for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 27. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff, who was seventeen years old at the time of the accident, claimed damages for breach by the defendants of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937. HILBERY, J., decided against the plaintiff, who put his case in various alternative ways in his statement of claim. He alleged, first, that his injury was due to a breach of s. 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, which provides:

"Every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced."

On the basis that the machinery by which the plaintiff was injured was transmission machinery, HILBERY, J., held that it was securely fenced, and there was, therefore, no breach of the defendants' duty under the Act.

The facts can be summarised shortly. The machine in question was one for cleaning chocolate beans. The plaintiff's every day duties were to keep the floor round the machine clean and in the process collect any beans which had been spilled in the course of operating the machine, to wheel sacks of beans to a hole and shoot them into it, and to steady a ladder by standing on the foot when the charge hand required to go up the ladder. He was told to keep clear of the machine when it was in motion, and he understood this. On Friday afternoons when the machine was stopped he assisted in the cleaning, and, inter alia, went up a ladder and collected any beans that had spilt over on to a shelf. At the back end of the machine there was a cogged pulley wheel twenty-six inches in diameter. This wheel performed about eighteen revolutions a minute and engaged through a cogged pinion a horizontal shaft which was five feet, ten and a half inches, from the ground. The pinion was five and a half inches in diameter. The ledge to which I have referred was seven feet, eight inches, above the floor, so there was about nine inches between the top of the pulley wheel and the shelf. There was a rail about four feet high round the flooring below and immediately outside this apparatus. In front of the pulley wheel and shaft and the pinion was a circular wire mesh. This cleared the pinion, but by how much was not proved.

G

The accident happened in this way. The plaintiff had had impressed on him the importance of sweeping up beans before they were damaged. He had noticed that some of the beans fell from the ledge I have mentioned. When no one was about the plaintiff took a ladder and leant it against a rotating shaft which was at the top of the machine above the shelf. With no one to steady the ladder the plaintiff climbed up it to collect any beans there might be on the shelf. The ladder, owing to its being supported by a rotating shaft, started to slip sideways. The plaintiff must have put out his hand to try and clutch on to something, got hold of the pulley wheel over and behind the mesh, and the moving wheel took his hand downwards till it came between the pulley wheel and the pinion. The machine with the mesh had been there without any accident for over twenty years, and no complaint had been made by factory inspectors who had seen it from time to time.

A In considering the question whether it was securely fenced, HILBERY, J., applied what I may describe as the test of reasonable foreseeability. Was the machinery securely fenced having regard to circumstances which could reasonably be foreseen? It was not disputed that that was the proper test in deciding whether machinery is dangerous under s. 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. The principle in relation to s. 14 is formulated in a sentence by DU PARCQ, J., in Walker v. Bletchley Flettons, Ltd. (1) ([1937] 1 All E.R. 175):

B “In considering whether machinery is dangerous you must not assume that everybody will always be careful . . . a part of machinery is dangerous if it is a possible cause of injury to anybody acting in a way in which a human being may be reasonably expected to act in circumstances which may be reasonably expected to occur.”

C The learned judge referred to a note in REDGRAVE'S FACTORIES, TRUCK AND SHOPS ACTS, 17th ed., p. 34, as in his opinion correct. The note is as follows:

D “The part is, it is submitted, securely fenced if the fencing, though it has not prevented the accident under consideration, was such fencing as removed the possibility of injury to anybody acting in a way a human being might be reasonably expected to act in circumstances that might reasonably be expected to occur.”

E The note is directed to the words “securely fenced” as they occur in s. 14, but it seems clear that they must have the same meaning in the two sections. Counsel for the appellant submitted that this was wrong. He submitted that machinery is not securely fenced unless it is so fenced as to prevent any accident, however improbable and unforeseeable the circumstances in which it happens, saving only a case where a man deliberately breaks the fencing. It must be as secure as any fencing can make it. If this is right, then the appeal must succeed as the fencing could have been carried on up to the ledge, or there could have been a circular return guard, as it was called, going from the edges of the circular mesh all round the pulley wheel.

F A number of authorities were referred to, and I will deal with them first. The facts in Vowles v. Armstrong-Siddeley Motors, Ltd. (2) are the nearest to the present case. It is a decision of this court. The case was tried with a jury, and judgment entered for the defendants. There was, as here, a fence, but also a part unfenced, and it was by putting his hand through the unfenced part that the plaintiff's injury had occurred. The jury found that the machinery was securely fenced. If this had stood alone I think the court would have accepted it on the basis that no one could have reasonably anticipated anyone putting a hand in through this unfenced area. The jury went on to find that the plaintiff had not materially contributed to the cause of the accident. The court regarded these two findings as inconsistent, and ordered a new trial on the basis that on the facts as proved they could not enter judgment for the plaintiff. If counsel for the plaintiff is right, it seems to me judgment must have been entered for the plaintiff, and there was no need for a new trial. The machinery, admittedly, was not as safe as fencing could make it.

H In Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3) the question was whether the fencing must be such as to prevent broken machinery from flying out. The actual decision does not, therefore, assist, but in the course of his speech LORD DU PARCQ said of the words “securely fenced” ([1948] 2 All E.R. 391):

“ . . . I think that they may well mean ‘so fenced as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably expected’.”

In Lyon v. Don Brothers, Buist & Co., Ltd. (4), the sheriff substitute had acquitted the employers on the ground that the machine was not dangerous. I think it is clear on the facts that the machine was not fenced at all, and if that is so the actual issue we have to decide was not necessary for the decision, but LORD NORMAND, in the course of his opinion, said this (1944 S.C. (J.) 5):

"If his work, for example, required him to stand more or less with his back towards the gear wheels and to use his hands in front of him, then of course it is true that the gear wheels were beyond his reach while he was doing his work, but under different conditions the gear wheels were well within his reach, and I think that the learned sheriff substitute has misdirected himself, for he appears to me to have applied the test whether the boy was protected by the fence while he was carrying on his work in an ordinary way. But in my opinion that is not the test which should be applied to determine what fencing is necessary under the Act. It can be appositely said that the standard to be observed is a fence which will prevent accidents from occurring in circumstances which may be reasonably anticipated, but the circumstances which may be reasonably anticipated include a great deal more than the staid, prudent, well-regulated conduct of men diligently attentive to their work, and the occupiers of factories are bound to reckon on the possibility of conduct very different from that. They are bound to take into account the possibility of negligent, ill-advised or indolent conduct on the part of their employees, and even of frivolous conduct, especially where young workers are employed. If the fencing is to secure operatives against injury which may reasonably be anticipated in that sense, then I am of opinion that there was a contravention of the section of the Act."

The two other learned lords agreed.

On the other side, counsel for the plaintiff relied on observations in three cases: Sowter v. Steel Barrel Co., Ltd. (5), Chasteney v. Nairn (Michael) & Co., Ltd. (6), and Findley v. Newman, Hender & Co., Ltd. (7). In all these there was, in fact, no fencing at all round the machinery, so that the point before us did not arise for decision. In the first case which was regarded, I think, as the leading case, it is plain that an accident of the kind that had happened had been foreseen, as, for a time, a guard which would have prevented the accident had been used. This is equally clear in the last case, where words were used by LORD HEWART, C.J. ([1937] 4 All E.R. 60) which seem to indicate the test contended for by counsel for the plaintiff. In that case the accident happened while two men were repairing a belt while certain mill gearing was in motion. There was an express prohibition of this which showed that its possibility had been realised. Counsel for the plaintiff relied on the statement by LORD HEWART, C.J., in that case that the purpose of s. 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, was to provide absolute safety so far as fencing could provide it.

I do not think there is any decision on the point binding on this court. I think the balance of dicta is slightly against the plaintiff. On the face of them the words used by LORD HEWART, C.J., are in his favour, but LORD HEWART, C.J., did not, I think, have in mind the issue whether the "absolute safety" was to be against foreseeable risks. LORD DU PARCQ and LORD NORMAND were clearly addressing their minds to the point in issue, and Vowles v. Armstrong-Siddeley Motors, Ltd. (2) is very nearly a direct authority against the argument. I will, however, consider the question of construction on principle. In the first place, I think that in this group of sections the same test should be applied in deciding whether machinery is "securely fenced" as is applied in deciding whether it is "dangerous." To an allegation that machinery which has, in fact, caused injury is dangerous it is admittedly a good answer to prove that it was not dangerous in any reasonably foreseeable circumstances. I see no difficulty in applying the same test to the question whether machinery is securely fenced, and would respectfully adopt the form in which the question is formulated on this basis by LORD DU PARCQ and LORD NORMAND. I think also that this construction fits in with the later words of sub-s. (1) of s. 13 of the Factories Act, 1937. They contemplate that the position of the transmission machinery may be such that there is no necessity to fence at all. If, no accident having happened, one imagines a prosecution based on these words, I would have thought the prosecution would have to establish that in reasonably foreseeable circumstances the machinery was not as safe as it would be if securely fenced. If one has to consider unforeseeable circumstances the legislature should and would, in my opinion, have provided that all transmission machinery must be completely encased. It also fits in with the later words from another angle. The later words contemplate that the position may make any fencing unnecessary. That being so, the "position" might well be such as to make fencing, for example, on one side only necessary. The argument for the plaintiff, I think, negatives this possibility.

Further, if the construction placed on the words by HILBERY, J., is a reasonably possible construction, then, this being a statute imposing penalties, it should, in my opinion, be adopted. I think myself that it is the natural construction. Having regard to the view taken by LORD DU PARCQ and LORD NORMAND and that taken by the learned judge in this case, it seems to me impossible to suggest that it is not a reasonable construction. In Franklin v. Gramophone Co., Ltd. (8) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 359) I expressed my respectful agreement with what LORD SIMONDS had said in London & North Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (9). LORD SIMONDS cited with approval ([1946] 1 All E.R. 270) the following passage from the judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Tuck & Sons v. Priester (10) (19 Q.B.D. 638):

"We must be very careful in construing that section, because it imposes a penalty. If there is a reasonable interpretation which will avoid the penalty in any particular case we must adopt that construction. If there are two reasonable constructions we must give the more lenient one. That is the settled rule for the construction of penal sections."

LORD WRIGHT, who dissented, had suggested that that principle did not apply to Acts such as the Factory Acts and to the Act being considered in that case, which was the Railway Employment (Prevention of Accidents) Act, 1900. LORD SIMONDS regarded the principle as applicable to all provisions imposing penalties, including those where the object of the Act, as here, was the protection of the life and limb of certain workers. He said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 270):

"A man is not to be put in peril upon an ambiguity, however much or little the purpose of the Act appeals to the predilection of the court."

Therefore, I think HILBERY, J., applied the right test. Counsel for the plaintiff argued in the alternative that on this basis the judge came to the wrong conclusion. He submitted that HILBERY, J., concentrated on the plaintiff's conduct, and, holding, as he did, that that was not reasonably foreseeable, regarded that as concluding the issue. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that that was not the right approach. The question was not whether what the plaintiff actually did was reasonably foreseeable, but whether the occupier should have reasonably foreseen the possibility of an accident. I agree with that. The question is whether a prosecution would have succeeded before the accident which leads to the claim has happened. On the other hand, if, an accident having happened, no one can suggest other circumstances which would have led to an accident, the issue may, in fact, narrow itself to the question whether the circumstances which led to the accident were reasonably foreseeable. I think that this criticism of the judgment fails. I do not think HILBERY, J., confined himself to considering the foreseeability of the plaintiff's conduct. He referred to the fact that the factory inspector had seen this fencing many times, and that there was evidence of no previous accident over the twenty years or so of its life. He considered the possibility of someone putting a hand up underneath the mesh. He said:

"I personally cannot see, if you test the question by what was reasonably foreseeable, that it can be said that the lack of a return guard over it from the face guard rendered this insecure fencing."

It is only after this that he proceeds to consider whether the employers could have foreseen what the plaintiff actually did. A

Counsel for the plaintiff further submitted that in any event HILBERY, J., came to the wrong conclusion. On this basis the question is one of fact. The judge in a careful judgment seems to me to have considered all the relevant circumstances, and I agree with the conclusion to which he came for the reasons which he gave. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal. B

COHEN, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. I agree entirely with the conclusion to which he has come, and I do not desire to add any observations of mine in agreeing that the appeal should be dismissed. B

DENNING, L.J.: The rotating gear wheel was clearly transmission machinery which had to be "securely fenced." Fencing means the erection of a barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machine: see per LORD PORTER in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 389), and a machine is "securely fenced" if the barricade is such as to prevent any employee from moving into contact with it: see LORD MORTON's opinion, ibid., 394. Applying this test, the wire mesh was clearly insufficient, for it barricaded the wheel only from a frontal approach and not from the flanks which were left wide open, and any employee could put his hand or arm through them, accidentally or deliberately, and reach the wheel. C D

I wish I could end my judgment there, for it is really all that is necessary, but I must go on because it is said that, in considering whether a machine is "securely fenced," the court must consider whether the action of the employee in getting caught by it could be foreseen. I cannot see what that has to do with it. It seems to me that foreseeability only arises at the next stage if and when it is said by the occupier that the machine was "in such a position that it was as safe as it would be if securely fenced." The primary obligation on the occupier is to see that the machine is "securely fenced." Once the prosecution proves the absence of fencing, then, if the occupier relies on the exception "as safe as if securely fenced," the burden is on him to prove it, not on the prosecution to negative it: see Chalmers v. Speedwell Wire Co. (11), and Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3). The test of the exception is foreseeability. If you can foresee the possibility of a man moving into contact with the machinery when unfenced, it is clearly not as safe as if securely fenced, but, if you cannot foresee anyone coming into contact with it, then it is as safe as if securely fenced. A good illustration is given by Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3) where twenty feet of the belt was not fenced, but that twenty feet was in such a position that no one could anticipate that a man could move into contact with it, and no man did, so it was held to be as safe as it would be if securely fenced: see per LORD PORTER ([1948] 2 All E.R. 388). E F G

Once foreseeability is accepted as the test of the exception it cannot also be the test of the primary obligation. Section 13 of the Factories Act, 1937, enjoins the court to make a comparison between machinery which is unfenced and the same machinery as it would be if it was securely fenced. That comparison can only be made by first visualising an effective barricade in position, and then asking whether the machinery is as safe as if the barricade was there. To make the comparison by asking what could be foreseen leads nowhere, because foreseeability would be both the test of "securely fenced" and also the test of "as safe as if securely fenced," so that no comparison would be possible. H

The view which I have expressed is strongly supported by s. 15, which shows that, when considering whether machinery is "as safe" as if securely fenced, the persons who might move into contact with it must be considered—that is, foreseeability, but there is no such provision in seeing whether it is "securely fenced." The effect of s. 15, is, I think, this. If it can be foreseen that someone might unnecessarily examine an unfenced machine while in motion and thus come into contact with it, it is obviously not as safe as if securely fenced, but, if
A the only person that can be foreseen as coming into contact with it is an examiner over eighteen years of age making a necessary examination, then the machinery need not be fenced so long as the various conditions of s. 15 are complied with, but the employee must at his peril make sure that they are complied with. If
B a boy of seventeen, for instance, should do the examining, or if a workman should make an examination which it is unnecessary to carry out while the machinery is in motion, the employer is liable whether he could have foreseen his action or not, and the reason is because the machine is not "securely fenced" and the employer cannot avail himself of s. 15 to say it is "as safe" as if securely fenced: see s. 130 (3) of the Act and Nash v. High Duty Alloys, Ltd. (12). This shows that the question of "secure fencing" depends, not on foreseeability, but only on
C whether there is an effective barricade round the machine.

The cases on s. 14 do not present any difficulty to my mind. The question whether machinery is "dangerous" when unfenced is, of course, a question of degree and depends on the foreseeable contingencies. So, also, is the question whether it is "as safe" as if securely fenced. Those two questions normally stand or fall together, because once a machine is found to be dangerous it must
D be securely fenced, and the occupier can only avoid fencing by showing that it is "as safe" as if securely fenced, a thing he cannot do in the case of a dangerous machine unless he can avail himself of s. 15. It is apparent, therefore, that in cases under s. 14, unless s. 15 applies, the only inquiries are: (i) Is the machine dangerous, and, (ii) If so, is it securely fenced? The answer to the first question depends on foreseeability, and the courts apply the test laid down by E PARCQ, J., in Walker v. Bletchley Flettons, Ltd. (1), recently approved by this court in Smithwick v. National Coal Board (13).

The answer to the second question depends on the effectiveness of the barricade and on compliance with s. 16, and the courts apply the test laid down by F SALTER, J., in Davies v. Owen (Thomas) & Co., Ltd. (14), as approved by this court in Miller v. Boothman (William) & Sons, Ltd. (15): see also TUCKER, J., in Lotinga v. North Eastern Marine Engineering Co. (1938), Ltd. (16).

The reference to s. 14 prompts the reflection that, if the test whether machinery is "securely fenced" were to depend on foreseeability of danger, then it would be the same as the test whether the machinery is "dangerous" or not, and there would be no distinction between ss. 12 and 13, on the one hand, and s. 14, on the other hand. Prime movers and transmission machinery would only have to
G be fenced if they were dangerous, whereas the statute makes it clear that they must be fenced whether they are dangerous or not: see Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3), per LORD PORTER ([1948] 2 All E.R. 389). I recognise that the words of LORD NORMAND in Lyon v. Don (4), and of LORD DU PARCQ in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons, Ltd. (3) appear to be contrary to the view I am here expressing of the meaning of "securely fenced," but
H I do not think they were directing their minds to the point that arises here. My conclusion is, therefore, that foreseeability is not the test whether a machine is "securely fenced." The true test is whether there was an effective barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with the machine. Applying that test, I think that this machinery was not securely fenced. It was not suggested either at the trial or before us that it was in such a position, or of such a construction, that it was as safe as it would be if securely fenced. There was, therefore, in my opinion, a breach of s. 13 of the Factories Act, 1937.

The only remaining question is one of contributory negligence. This boy was only seventeen, and he was cleaning the machine in motion on a Friday morning whereas he ought to have waited till the Friday afternoon when it was stationary. That is just the sort of thing, carelessness of that kind by boys of that age, that the Factory Acts are especially intended to provide against: see s. 15 of the Act. In these circumstances I am not much disposed to allow the occupier to throw all his responsibility off on to this boy by the plea of contributory negligence. I should myself put much the greater responsibility on the occupier. The Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, gives ample scope for a just and equitable award, and I should have made the occupier bear at least two-thirds of the damage. I know that this court does not normally interfere with the judge's assessment of responsibility, but I think we should do so here because he does not seem to have had sufficient regard to the fact that the accident was to a boy of only seventeen. I would, therefore, be in favour of allowing the appeal.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re PRATT. Ex parte INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PHILLIPS (TRUSTEE IN BANKRUPTCY).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 20, 23, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Preferential claim—Assessed tax—Excess profits tax in respect of a chargeable accounting period other than last completed period before bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 33 (1) (a).

On Apr. 23, 1948, a receiving order was made against the debtor, and he was adjudicated bankrupt on May 3. On July 27, 1949, an assessment of £5,000 was made on him in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944, and on Sept. 7, 1949, the Crown claimed preferential payment of this sum under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1) (a). The trustee in bankruptcy rejected the claim.

HELD: on the true construction of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act the Crown's right to priority in respect of assessed taxes was not limited to the tax assessed in respect of the last fiscal year before the bankruptcy, but extended to all taxes assessed in respect of the period up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, subject to the qualification, imposed by the final phrase of s. 33 (1) (a), that the priority was limited to one year's assessment, and, therefore, the priority covered the assessment of £5,000 in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944, and the Crown was entitled to preferential payment of this sum.

Gowers v. Walker ([1930] 1 Ch. 262), and Re Campbell (1923) (10 Tax Cas. 585), applied.

Decision of the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division (ante, p. 540), reversed.

B APPEAL by the Crown from an order of the Divisional Court of the Chancery Division (ROMER and HARMAN, JJ.), dated July 17, 1950, and reported ante, p. 540, dismissing an appeal by the Crown from an order of His Honour JUDGE TUDOR REES, made at Brentford County Court on Apr. 26, 1950, on a motion by the Crown asking for the reversal of a decision of the debtor's trustee in bankruptcy rejecting the Crown's claim to rank as a preferential creditor in respect of the sum of £5,000 excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944.

C A receiving order was made against the debtor on Apr. 23, 1948. On May 3, 1948, he was adjudicated bankrupt. On July 27, 1949, an assessment of £5,000 in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period of twelve months ended Dec. 31, 1944, was made on him. On Aug. 13, 1949, it was issued. D On Sept. 7 the Crown claimed preferential payment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1) (a), in respect of this sum and also in respect of income tax and sur-tax to which the debtor had been assessed for the year 1944/1945. The trustee in bankruptcy admitted the claim in respect of the income tax and sur-tax, but rejected the claim in respect of the excess profits tax on the ground that the Crown's preferential claim in respect of income tax, sur-tax and excess profits tax should be limited to precisely the same period in each case. The learned county court judge upheld the trustee's decision and dismissed the motion. E The Crown appealed, and, during the hearing of the appeal, it appeared to the Divisional Court sitting in bankruptcy that the real question in the case was whether the Crown was entitled to claim preference for an assessed tax in respect of a period other than the last completed period before the bankruptcy. After argument on this question, the Divisional Court held (i) that, on the true construction of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, the Crown's right to priority in respect of an assessed tax was confined to the year of assessment which immediately preceded the bankruptcy, and, therefore, the Crown was not entitled to preferential payment of the £5,000 in respect of excess profits tax for the chargeable accounting period ended Dec. 31, 1944; (ii) that the reference to Apr. 5 in s. 33 (1) (a) merely denoted the end of a period, i.e., the fiscal year, and, therefore, in cases of excess profits tax there should be substituted for "Apr. 5" whatever might be the date which marked the end of the chargeable accounting period of any particular trade or business.

F Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Crown.

Salmon, K.C., and C. H. Duveen for the trustee in bankruptcy.

H SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: This appeal raises a question of the construction of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 33 (1) (a), which reads:

"(1) In the distribution of the property of a bankrupt there shall be paid in priority to all other debts (a) All parochial or other local rates due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and having become due and payable within twelve months next before that time, and all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment."

The appeal relates to the second part of the paragraph. Put in the briefest form, the question is whether the words there used entitle the Crown to claim priority in regard to unpaid tax assessed, not in respect of the fiscal year immediately before the receiving order, but in respect of any earlier year. In a reserved judgment, ROMER, J., and HARMAN, J., came to the conclusion in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy that, on the true construction of that paragraph, the Crown's right was limited to the tax assessed in respect only of the last fiscal year before the bankruptcy, and held that the Crown could not claim priority in regard to tax assessed in respect of an earlier year, the assessment for the earlier year being, as may be regarded as natural in the circumstances, for a much larger sum. I have said that it was a reserved judgment, and I have considered whether it would not be proper that this court should also reserve its judgment, but, having reached a clear conclusion on what is after all a short point of construction of a few words in the statute, I feel that I can properly and without disrespect to the learned judges below deliver my judgment now, though, as will appear, I have reached a different conclusion from that which they entertained.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report of the case before the Divisional Court (ante, p. 540), and I need not relate them all again. The bankrupt had a receiving order made against him on Apr. 23, 1948, and was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt. At the time of the receiving order there had been no assessments made in respect of various taxes for a number of years, but in July, 1949, assessments were made, not only in respect to income tax and sur-tax, but also for excess profits tax. It is well known that, for the purposes of income tax and sur-tax, the fiscal year in respect of which the subject is from time to time assessed goes from April to April, and there can be no doubt that the reference to "Apr. 5" in s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914 is connected with that fact. It is otherwise, however, in regard to excess profits tax, where the actual year for assessment will vary according to the business practice of the individual or firm concerned. In the present case, the bankrupt's trading year and accounting year, and, therefore, the fiscal year from the point of view of excess profits tax, was from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31. That fact has a bearing on the earlier history of this case to which I will allude in a moment, but, to complete what it is necessary to say on the facts, the assessments which I have mentioned included assessments to income tax and sur-tax for the two income tax years 1943/44 and 1944/45 and also the excess profits tax assessments for the two years ended Dec. 31, 1944, and Dec. 31, 1945. As regards sur-tax and income tax, the latter of the two years gave the greater figure for tax due. In this court, and in the court below, there has been no question about the propriety of the Crown's claim, under s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, to priority in respect of the sums assessed for sur-tax and income tax for the latter of the two fiscal years, although, as will be observed, that year was not in fact the last income tax year before the receiving order. As regards excess profits tax, the figures worked out differently, for of the two years I have mentioned the tax due is far larger in the earlier of the two years. The assessment is for £5,000 for that year, whereas for the year ended Dec. 31, 1945, it is £222.

The question is whether the Crown can claim priority in respect of the £5,000 excess profits tax assessed for the year ended Dec. 31, 1944. When the matter first came before the county court, and also when it came before the Divisional Court, the question at issue was whether, having regard to the final words of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, a claim could be made in respect of that amount of excess profits tax, though the tax claimed was in respect of a different year from that in reference to which sur-tax and income tax were claimed. It was suggested that, if for income tax and sur-tax purposes the fiscal year ending

Apr. 5, 1945, was taken, then all that the Crown could claim in priority by way of excess profits tax would be a proportion for the same fiscal year of the excess profits tax for the calendar year ended Dec. 31, 1944. I will say at once that that argument has not been put to this court at all. In other words, it is conceded for the purposes of this appeal (though I am not to be taken as hinting that the concession is not properly made) that, where there are taxes differing in that they are assessed with regard to different fiscal years, the Crown is not bound to squeeze all the taxes, by apportionments where necessary, into a single fiscal year. When the matter came before the two learned judges in the Divisional Court, however, those judges drew attention to the language of s. 33 (1) (a) and suggested that, on the true view of it, the only right to priority conferred on the Crown in respect of any assessed taxes was in respect of the last appropriate fiscal year immediately before the receiving order, a point which had not in actual fact been taken either in the county court or before the Divisional Court. But, the point having been taken, the matter was debated, and, as already indicated, the learned judges maintained the view which they had earlier indicated and expressed it in their judgment.

The point being taken in that way and neither side having come prepared to argue it, there was no such investigation (as we have had) of the earlier history of this piece of legislation. That, I think, had a very important bearing on the result. For my part, I agree with the argument of counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy that, whichever be the right view of this paragraph, the language selected is not the happiest which could have been chosen. That may have to do with the history of the paragraph to which I shall have to make some reference later. I feel no doubt, however, having carefully read the judgments given in the court below, that, as a background to the solution of the problem, the learned judges were influenced by the consideration that, as a matter of policy, and reading the whole of s. 33 (1) and not merely para. (a) thereof, it appeared to them that the section was designed to give priority in respect only of claims which, in the nature of events, the claimants could not have got in by ordinary means before the debtor became overwhelmed. Pursuing that a stage further, counsel for the trustee pressed on us this consideration with no little cogency. He said that, if the Crown's right to select the most fruitful of the tax years preceding the receiving order is upheld, then it will remove from the general pool for distribution among the whole body of creditors an unfairly large share of the bankrupt's assets. ROMER, J., and HARMAN, J., approached the section in the light of considerations of that kind, and, noting, as is natural enough, the imperfections of language, felt themselves constrained, if they could, to arrive at a conclusion which was in keeping with the scheme which they envisaged and which they felt would do most justice to all the various creditors concerned.

The advantage, however, which this court has had is that an investigation of the earlier history of this legislation has made plain beyond doubt that, until the statutory and limited priority in respect of taxes was first introduced 101 years ago, the Crown, in right of the Royal prerogative, was entitled to priority in respect of all assessed taxes. Therefore, the statutory provisions now found in s. 33, having their remotest ancestry in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 166, operated as a limitation on the Crown's prerogative right, a limitation to be observed in the final words of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, "not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment." Counsel for the Crown was, therefore, fully justified in urging us to approach this problem of construction on the footing that, since the common law right was being cut down, it must not be treated as cut down more than was required by the language used. On that view I approach the matter from a somewhat different standpoint from that taken by the Divisional Court. I think that the problems of construction, which are certainly not free from difficulty, should be considered bearing in mind always that s. 33 (1) (a) has the effect, quoad the Crown, of limiting what would otherwise be the much wider right that the Crown would have. So far as the pre-existing prerogative right is concerned, it is, I think, only necessary to refer to the judgment of the Privy Council delivered by LORD MACNAGHTEN in New South Wales Taxation Comrs. v. Palmer (1).

I would like to make one other general observation by way of preface. True it is that only during the last generation or so has the size of the income tax and the general burden of taxation become such as to make the particular problem in such a case as the present of great significance as between the Crown, on the one hand, and the rest of the creditors, on the other. Still, we have been told that it has always been the view of those responsible for the collection of these taxes that the priority given was not limited to what I may call the last fiscal year, but gave a right to the Crown to select the most favourable year available. Because that view has been taken and accepted for years and years, it does not, of course, follow that we must give to the paragraph a construction in conformity with it. There has, however, also been some expression of judicial opinion which is to the same effect. The point has never come for direct decision before the court until the present case, in the sense that it never seems, in any of the cases cited, to have been argued. There has, however, been a number of cases in which, had the point been thought of, it would inevitably have been argued.

The cases are summarised in the judgment of the court below, and I should be adding nothing to what is there said if I went through them all again, but I think I must mention three or four of them briefly. The one most alluded to is Gowers v. Walker (2), which came before EVE, J., in 1929. In that case no assessments to income tax had been made on the defendant company for a number of years before the appointment of a receiver under a power contained in an instrument of charge which the company had effected. After the receiver took possession, assessments were made covering the five previous years. The question which came before the learned judge was whether the Crown was entitled to priority under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 209 (1) (a) [which is in substantially the same terms as s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914], in respect of the second of those five years, which was four years before the appointment of the receiver. The argument against the Crown's right was of a different character from that now put forward. It was suggested that the words "assessed on the company up to Apr. 5 next before" the date of the appointment of the receiver meant that the date of the assessment must precede Apr. 5 next before the appointment of the receiver. Since, in that case, there had been no relevant assessment at all before the appointment of the receiver, it followed, if that argument were right, that no priority could be claimed for any of the assessments. The learned judge rejected that contention, holding that the words "up to" were not synonymous with "before" but were used in the sense in which those words are used in accountancy matters, so that the formula "assessed on the company up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the appointment of the receiver" meant "assessed in respect of the period up to Apr. 5 next before the appointment of the receiver." Having reached that conclusion, the learned judge answered in the affirmative the particular question raised, and, of course, in so doing, incidentally answered the present question, for the year selected was not the last of the five years before the appointment of the receiver or before that Apr. 5 which came immediately before the receiver's appointment. It is quite true that the point was not argued, but in his judgment the learned judge used this language ([1930] 1 Ch. 267):

"The priority is given in the case of rates only to so much as remains unpaid, on the date fixed by sub-s. 5, of rates which become due and payable within twelve months next before that date and in the case of income tax to not more than one year's assessment of the tax assessed on the company up to the end of the financial year next before that date."

That statement and that conclusion have been treated as determining this particular matter by, for example, BENNETT, J. (16 Tax Cas. 722), in Re Cockell (3), and by the Supreme Court in Eire in A.-G. v. Irish Steel, Ltd. (4). It is said that, in so far as that statement by EVE, J., has been treated as authoritative, it should now be reviewed. It was not based on argument and was made, as counsel for the trustee in bankruptcy says, per incuriam.

- A In Re Campbell (5), which came before ROMER, J., in 1923, an insolvent person, who died on Oct. 4, 1920, owed sums for super-tax in respect of each of the years 1916/1917 to 1919/1920 inclusive. The question before ROMER, J., related to a sum which the trustees of a settlement (under which the debtor had a life interest) had raised during the debtor's lifetime as an advancement for payment of his debts, including his arrears of super-tax. The amount raised had been, in part, applied, before his death, in payment of his other debts, but not in payment of the super-tax, and his administratrix claimed to be entitled to appropriate the unapplied balance to payment of the super-tax owing for the year 1919/1920. It is apparent from the facts and figures given that it was a material consideration, assuming that she had this right to appropriate, in respect of what particular unpaid tax it would be exercised, because the Crown would naturally wish to claim priority in respect of the most fruitful of the assessments remaining undischarged. Again, as in Gowers v. Walker (2), the point was there and was a material point to be argued if it had been thought of. The counsel appearing before ROMER, J., were counsel of experience, but there is no trace of this particular point having been debated. Nevertheless, ROMER, J., clearly expressed his view of the construction of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, because he said (10 Tax Cas. 588):

- E “Now it appears that under s. 33 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, where there is an insolvent estate being administered by the court the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are entitled to claim priority in respect of income tax, which would include super-tax, in respect of any one year ending on Apr. 5, before the death of the testator.”

- F At the end of the judgment, there was some debate about the form of order, and the learned judge, in the course of that debate, again alluded to the view which he had already expressed in regard to the construction of the section. It is fair again to observe that the point had not, so far as one can see, been raised before the learned judge. Still, the judicial opinion (obiter though it may be) to which I have referred, cannot be ignored, being in line with what we are told has been the regular practice for a great many years. At the least, I have ventured to suggest, this unanimity supports the view that intelligent men, applying themselves to the reading of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914, have found the view for which counsel for the Crown now contend to be the understanding they have of the words used. Undoubtedly, however, ROMER, J., and HARMAN, J., in the Divisional Court in this case, were well entitled to regard the matter as free from authority binding on them.

- G I must make some further reference to the legislation because, as I have said, the present case is concerned with excess profits tax, whereas the cases to which I have been alluding referred to income tax. I have already pointed out that the reference to “Apr. 5 next” is particularly appropriate for income tax and sur-tax, but may not be appropriate at all to excess profits tax. The first enactment in regard to the payment of assessed taxes out of the estate of a bankrupt was in 1849 [the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 166]. The language then was different. It was a much briefer section. So far as relevant, it provided that the court:

- H “... out of the estate and effects of the bankrupt, shall order payment of all duties of assessed taxes assessed on the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy up to Apr. 5 next after the same shall have happened (such payment not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment) . . . ”

Whether with that form of words the same answer should be given to the question: What is the meaning of “up to Apr. 5,” as was given by EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (2), to a similar question founded on the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 209 (1) (a), which is substantially similar to the language of s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, it is unnecessary for me to consider. It will, however, be noticed that the limitation “such payment not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment” appears in parenthesis in s. 166 of the Act of 1849, and, if I may say so, in a rather more natural context than in s. 33 (1) (a) of the Act of 1914. Section 166 of the Act of 1849 is stating that the court is to order prior payment of all duties of assessed taxes, such payment not, however, to exceed in the whole one year's assessment. It is unnecessary to take up further time considering the true meaning of that section, because, from 1869 onwards, the relevant legislation has taken substantially the form that it takes to-day. The Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 32 (1), as regards the meaning to be given to the words “up to,” might be regarded as differing from the existing legislation, but, at any rate from 1883, the paragraph has followed the same form—the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 40 (1) (a), is almost identical with s. 33 (1) (a) of the present Act, and, so far as relevant, it may be treated as identical. Therefore, ever since 1883 the problem which is now before the court has, so to speak, appeared on the face of the statute. In the later Acts, as in the present Act, provision is also made for giving priority to various other items of indebtedness. Since some argument has been rested on this, I should observe that since 1883, in all the cases other than the tax cases, there appear words which do have the effect of limiting the right to priority to sums which have accrued due within a definite limited period immediately preceding the receiving order. In Ex parte Fox, Re Smith (6), to which counsel for the trustee referred, it was suggested that there was not such uniformity, and that, in the case of wages or salary to a clerk, the expression, “during four months before the date of the receiving order” [in s. 40 (1) (b) of the Act of 1883], did not necessarily mean next immediately before, but CAVE, J., decided that it did. I should state, as regards that particular matter, that, until 1883 [e.g., in s. 32 (2) of the Act of 1869], the language was such that the four months' period might have been at any time previous to the receiving order, but a change was then made limiting it in the way in which it is now limited.

I must add one final reference to the statutes. The excess profits tax with which we are concerned was introduced at one remove, so to speak, into the bankruptcy provisions by the combined effect of the Finance Act, 1937, sched. V, Part III, para. 5, and the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 21. The joint effect of those Acts is to give to excess profits tax the same priority, whatever that priority may be, as s. 33 (1) (a) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, gives to income tax. That way of introducing the priority has added complexity to the matter, because, as I have said, the date mentioned “Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order” would not, save in some cases by accident, be a relevant or proper or, indeed, a sensible date to mention in respect of excess profits tax.

The question, like all questions of construction, may be capable of great elaboration and analysis in argument, but in the end it comes down to the question: What do these few relevant words mean as a matter of English language? If I may read them again, the words are:

“ . . . and all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax, assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment.”

Approaching the matter from the premise which I have indicated, the learned judges came to the conclusion that the proper and fair meaning of those words was to limit the taxes to taxes assessed in respect of the financial year ended on Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order. In arriving at that conclusion, they were not dissenting from the conclusion at which EVE, J., had arrived in Gowers v. Walker (2), on the use of the words "up to", but they thought—I am putting it in the way it was put to us by counsel for the trustee—that, if one is asked the question: What are the assessed taxes of the bankrupt up to Apr. 5, 1948 (which is the relevant date here)?, one would, in answering, allude only to the taxes for the one fiscal year which ended on that date. I think that that way of putting it ignores the significance of the word "all." The phrase is "and all assessed taxes" assessed up to Apr. 5 next before the receiving order. I think if the question were asked, not: What is the income tax assessed up to Apr. 5, 1948?, but: What are all the taxes assessed up to Apr. 5, 1948?, it would not be natural, without at least asking for further explanation, to give by way of answer a reference only to the last fiscal year up to Apr. 5, 1948. Counsel for the trustee accepted below, and accepts in this court, the validity of the decision of EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (2), that "assessed up to Apr. 5," etc., is a reference to the accounting practice and means assessed in respect of the year or period ending Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order. Though a successful challenge of the decision of EVE, J., would in this case in fact dispose of the Crown's claim, yet it would be much more difficult for counsel for the trustee to sustain his present argument on construction if the words "up to Apr. 5," etc., were an allusion to the date of assessment. But we are proceeding (and I am casting no doubt on its soundness, having heard no argument on it) on the view that the words "up to Apr. 5" mean what EVE, J., said that they mean. And I am not persuaded that the conclusion which counsel for the trustee invites us to reach does sufficient justice, or, indeed, any justice, to the use of the word "all" in s. 33 (1) (a).

The next point which I think is significant is this. If it be true that the meaning of the words in s. 33 (1) (a) is to confine the priority to the income tax assessed in respect of the year ended Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order—I take that by way of example—prima facie, there would appear no need to add the words at the end of the paragraph, "and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment." Counsel for the trustee avoids that difficulty, as the learned judges did, by saying: "Circumstances might arise in which the assessment in respect of that last period might be for more than one year, e.g., a trader might change his financial year so that, as a result, the assessment for excess profits tax following the change would be, not for a year, but, say, for a period of fifteen months." That, I agree, is a possibility. On the view contended for it seems to be the only case which can be thought of requiring (it is said) some limiting words so that the priority would be in respect of twelve months and not fifteen months. Assuming, however, that that is right, I think that the words "and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment" are not then really appropriate, because, in the case supposed, assuming a fifteen months' period, one would have to make an apportionment giving priority, not to one year's assessment, but to four-fifths of a fifteen months' assessment. Going back to the history of this legislation in the context in which this particular limitation has constantly appeared, it seems to me that these words, "and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment," are not properly consistent with the trustee's view, but form an extremely powerful indication that what the legislature is doing is to secure that (though what has gone before is expressed to give priority for all taxes) the priority is limited, nevertheless, to one year. That seems to me the natural sense to give to these words.

Then the learned judges thought that the copulative "and" was inappropriate on the view for which the Crown contends. I have observed that all the other debts given priority are, by their language, limited to specific periods immediately prior to the receiving order. Therefore, this particular item of taxes is, on this view, distinct from the others. The learned judges thought that, if that were right, one would expect the word "but" to appear in the paragraph. I think, with all respect, that that argument cannot prevail and is sufficiently demonstrated as unsound if one inserts the word "but" and then attempts to read the paragraph, which is seen to be grammatically impossible.

This part of the argument is, no doubt, nicely balanced. I appreciate the argument of those on whose banner is the inscription: "Noscitur a sociis." The banner on the other side may be said to bear the device: "Expressio unius exclusio alterius." I find that the second banner provides in this context the more persuasive motto.

Finally, there arises the particular matter with which we are concerned namely, the application of this paragraph, not to income tax, but to excess profits tax, which, as in this case and in the vast majority of cases, is not assessed in respect of a period ending Apr. 5. If the view of the trustee is correct, one has not only to construe the material words of s. 33 (1) (a) as being equivalent to "assessed in respect of the fiscal year ended next before the date of the receiving order," but one has to assume that those words are, in fact, used. For it is the result of the argument and the conclusion below that, where as regards any tax the fiscal year ends, not on Apr. 5, but on some other date, one has to substitute that other date for Apr. 5. In other words, one has (as regards excess profits tax in the present case) to read it as "assessed on the bankrupt in respect of the year ended Dec. 31 next before the receiving order." That seems to me to be a difficult operation. If, however, the words are construed as I think they should be construed, namely, to give priority (subject to the prescribed limitation) to all taxes assessed in respect of the period prior to the relevant Apr. 5, then the priority will cover one year's assessment of excess profits tax provided that the assessment relates to a year ended prior to Apr. 5 next before the receiving order.

It would not generally be legitimate to place reliance on statutes passed in 1937 and 1939 as influencing the construction of statutes passed in 1883 and in 1914. We have been informed, however, that, even in early times, the taxes referred to in s. 33 (1) (a) cannot be treated as confined either to income tax or similar taxes related to the fiscal year ending Apr. 5 in any year. We were told that at relevant dates there were taxes, such as the window tax, for which the fiscal year was different from the fiscal year relating to income tax. I think, therefore, that the argument which emerges from excess profits tax could legitimately be used when applied to other taxes known or contemplated when the provision was first enacted.

For the reasons I have indicated, I think that the more natural construction is that for which the Crown has argued, and I regretfully, but clearly, come to a different conclusion from that at which the learned judges below arrived. I am much influenced to that end by the consideration about the earlier common law right which was a matter not considered by the learned judges below. If more general considerations are permissible, I also think that the suggestions which counsel for the Crown put forward are more persuasive on the whole than those which counsel for the trustee indicated and to which I have already alluded, namely, the presumption that fairness and justice would be done by giving a much more limited right to the Crown and by proceeding on the view that there should only be priority in respect of debts which, in the nature of the events, the creditor had been unable to collect. I think that there is great force in another view of it. Matters like wages, and such like, accrue regularly and probably at a regular rate. Taxes, as we know, are different. They are the subject of assessments which may be postponed by argument and other events for years and years, so that at any particular date it may be a wholly uncertain matter what will be the debts due when the taxes have been finally assessed. It is likely, indeed, that at the date of the receiving order there will be more than one year's taxes to be accounted for. It is common knowledge that, as a trader—and, as counsel for the Crown observed, these bankruptcy provisions originally applied exclusively to traders—approaches his financial doom, he becomes less likely than ever to pay taxes, and, indeed, less likely than ever to get his taxes assessed. Finally, there is this consideration to be remembered. As a trader approaches insolvency, it is obvious that the profits in respect of which taxes would be assessed may be falling off, so that, if the last year were the one for which alone the Crown could claim priority, it would be likely to be getting a prior claim for the smallest of many years' taxes which we will assume as likely to be in arrear. No such considerations, however, apply, for instance, to wages and other matters which are dealt with in s. 33 (1) (b) and s. 33 (1) (c) of the Act of 1914. I do not wish to place any undue emphasis on this point, but at least it provides, as I think, a sensible argument supporting the view that there is a valid distinction between State taxes, on the one hand, and other matters for which priority is given, on the other hand. I think those considerations may be fairly balanced against the points which counsel for the trustee urged. However that may be, as a matter of construction, I have formed a different view from that formed by the court below, and I think that the Crown succeeds, and that this appeal should be, accordingly, allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. In nearly forty years preceding the decision now under appeal the construction of s. 33 (1) (a) put forward by the Revenue has not been challenged, and the soundness of that construction is assumed or is implicit in a number of decisions which are not directed to the precise point. Such considerations are, of course, not conclusive, but they are not without significance. Section 33 (1) (a) is one which, as SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., has pointed out, so far from conferring additional powers on the Crown, curtails its prerogative. Hence there is no room in this case for the presumption that any ambiguity which the section may present should be resolved against the Crown. The phrase to be construed is:

“... all assessed taxes ... assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order ...”

That is in this case up to Apr. 5, 1948. If the bankrupt has been assessed to, and has failed to pay (for that is what “assessed” means at this point), the assessed taxes in respect of a whole series of years, all of them being years anterior to Apr. 5, 1948, the words I have read, if they stood alone, would, as it seems to me, be apt in their plain and grammatical meaning to cover the whole of the years in question, and, but for the words which follow, the Crown could make its preferential claim in respect of all of those years. There is, however, the final phrase in s. 33 (1) (a) to be considered. The effect of those final words is to limit the Crown's priority to taxes assessed in respect of any one of the series of years. On the construction contended for by counsel for the trustee, those final words, “and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment,” seem to me to be functionless. Counsel for the trustee suggested one state of facts in which they would have some meaning or operation, but it appears to me that the answer of counsel for the Crown to that suggestion was convincing. On the other hand, on the construction contended for by counsel for the Crown, the meaning of these concluding words is clear and their presence makes a vital difference. For these reasons, and those given by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree that the appeal should be allowed. As a matter of language, I entirely agree that taxes assessed for a series of financial years ending, as all such years do, on Apr. 5, can properly be described as assessed up to the last day of the last of those years. Moreover, the material part of s. 33 (1) (a) deals with the indebtedness of the bankrupt in respect of assessed taxes. Assuming a bankrupt who had had tax assessed on him for each of the first four of the five financial years preceding the date of the bankruptcy, and assuming that he had a final year's trading down to Apr. 5 next before that date in respect of which no liability to tax was attracted, the amount of the assessments for the four productive years being, shall we say, £1,000 a year, and none of them paid, and supposing the question was asked after the receiving order: "What is the indebtedness of the bankrupt in respect of taxes assessed on him up to Apr. 5 last?" I venture to think that the answer: "He owes nothing," would be an extremely surprising one, and yet it would be the true and correct answer on the argument of counsel for the trustee. That argument turns, and turns entirely, on the reference to "Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order" which s. 33 (1) (a) contains. Supposing the paragraph had read: "assessed on the bankrupt up to the date of the receiving order," it seems to me that there would not have been a vestige of support for this argument. For obvious reasons of convenience, which were pointed out by EVE, J., in Gowers v. Walker (2), Apr. 5 was selected as the date on which the line should be drawn because that is the end of the financial year. It is, no doubt, true that, by a process of association of ideas, Apr. 5 suggests the preceding Apr. 6, and all the painful associations connected with the period so measured, but, in my judgment, that association affords no real justification for holding that the phrase, "assessed on the bankrupt up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order," means "assessed on the bankrupt for the twelve months ended on that Apr. 5."

Therefore, on a question which, in the end, as SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has said, is a short question of construction, treating it purely as a matter of interpreting language, I come to the same conclusion as the other members of the court. I also think that on the whole the other considerations tending to support that conclusion outweigh those which the learned judges in the Divisional Court held to be decisive in the opposite sense. I think that it would be an unreasonable result if, where a bankrupt with a diminishing income incurred large tax liabilities, say, two or three years before the date of the receiving order, and incurred no such liability in the financial year immediately preceding that date, there was no priority for any of that tax because (although it was unpaid tax which had been duly assessed on the bankrupt) it all related to a year or years earlier than the last complete fiscal year preceding the date of the receiving order. I think that this result of the construction placed on s. 33 (1) (a) by the Divisional Court would really contradict the primary provision to the effect that all assessed taxes are to rank for priority subject to the qualifications later imposed. I also agree that, if there were any doubt as to the meaning of the words preceding them, the final words, "and not exceeding in the whole one year's assessment," are really decisive of the construction we are now adopting. Counsel for the trustee sought to show that in certain cases they might not, on his construction, be wholly otiose, but I think they really must be so, because his construction, as I understand it, involves nothing short of construing the reference to the assessment up to Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order as a reference to an assessment in respect of twelve months ending on that date, and that in itself must necessarily limit the claim to one year's assessment.

Finally, I agree that the way in which other cases of preferential debts are dealt with in s. 33 (1) reinforces the conclusion to which we have come. That seems to me to be particularly striking in para. (a) itself, in which two types of debt are dealt with. The first is parochial or local rates, the second is assessed taxes. The first branch of para. (a) provides that "all parochial or other local rates" are to have priority subject to two conditions. First, they must be due from the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and, secondly, they must have "become due and payable within twelve months next before that time." The second branch of para. (a) deals with "all assessed taxes, land tax, property or income tax," and in the like manner gives these claims priority subject to two conditions—(i) that they must have been assessed on the bankrupt up to

Apr. 5 next before the date of the receiving order, as opposed to being actually due at the date of the receiving order, which is the requirement in the case of parochial or other local rates, and (ii) that they must not exceed in the whole one year's assessment. The two conditions in the second branch of s. 33 (1) (a) are of an entirely different order and expressed in entirely different language from those in the first part. In particular, there is a conspicuous absence of any requirement to the effect that the tax must relate to some particular limited period preceding the date of the receiving order. For the reasons given by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and ASQUITH, L.J., with the additional considerations which I have endeavoured to express, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs here and in the court below, the trustee being empowered to recoup himself out of the estate.

HARLOW v. MINISTER OF TRANSPORT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ., and Vaisey, J.), October 18, 19, 20, 1950.]

Town and Country Planning—Highway—Stopping up—Power of Minister of Transport—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 49 (1).

By the Regulation and Inclosure (Totternhoe) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1886, the provisional order of regulation and provisional order of inclosure set forth in the schedule to the Act were confirmed. The schedule provided, inter alia, that, "so far as may be practicable, the ancient roads or tracks respectively known as 'the Drovers Way' and 'the Icknield Way' [shall] be preserved in their present condition." The schedule also provided that there should be reserved to the inhabitants of Totternhoe and the public generally at all times a right of walking over certain land (which land included a public right of way known as the "Wheelbarrow Green Highway"). The Act was an inclosure Act, and thereafter a valuer made an award to carry into effect the provisions of the Act.

Prior to 1947 a cement company applied for development permission for the obtaining of chalk from land in the vicinity of the Drovers Way and the Wheelbarrow Green Highway, and on the coming into force of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, the application fell to be treated, by virtue of s. 77 (1) of the Act, as an application for planning permission under Part III of the Act. Planning permission was granted, and, to enable the development to be carried out under that permission, the Minister of Transport made the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949, under s. 49 (1) of the Act, for the stopping up and diversion of the said highways. H., as a person aggrieved, applied under s. 11 (2) of the Act to quash the order on the ground that it was ultra vires the Minister since it overrode the provisions of the Act of 1886.

HELD: the provisions in the schedule to the Act of 1886 did not so deal with the highways in question as to exclude the application thereto of general words in a later Act, but were merely directions to the valuer making his award under that Act, and, therefore, the Minister was authorised by s. 49 of the Act of 1947 to make the order.

Decision of BIRKETT, J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 898), reversed.

[FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, s. 49, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, pp. 793, 794.]

Case referred to:

- (1) Seward v. Vera Cruz, The Vera Cruz, (1884), 10 App. Cas. 59; 54 L.J.P. 9; 52 L.T. 474; 49 J.P. 324; 42 Digest 769, 1959.

APPEALS by the defendants, the Ministry of Transport and the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd., from an order of BIRKETT, J., dated Mar. 8, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 898, quashing the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 2130), made under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 49 (1).

BIRKETT, J., held that the Regulation and Inclosure (Totternhoe) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1886 (which, it was argued, gave to local inhabitants the right at all times to have certain highways preserved in their then condition) did not regulate any "development" of land, as defined by s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1947, but merely confirmed the existing use, and, therefore, s. 118 (1) of the Act of 1947 did not empower the Minister to override the Act of 1886, and the order must be quashed. The Court of Appeal did not find it necessary to decide that question, but decided the appeals on the ground stated in the headnote.

Rowe, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the Minister of Transport.

H. B. Williams, K.C., and W. B. Harris for the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd., which was authorised by the Minister of Transport to provide new highways in place of those stopped up.

Simes, K.C., and Steer for the applicant for the order quashing the Minister's order.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: These are appeals from a decision of BIRKETT, J., by which he quashed an order made by the Minister of Transport under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 49 (1). The sub-section provides:

"Without prejudice to the provisions of s. 23 of the [Town and Country Planning Act, 1944], as incorporated with this Act, or s. 3 of the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, the Minister of Transport may, if he is satisfied that it is necessary so to do in order to enable development to be carried out in accordance with planning permission granted under Part III of this Act or to be carried out by a government department, by order made in accordance with the provisions of sched. VI to this Act authorise the stopping up or diversion of any highway."

Section 49 (4) (a) provides that an order made under this section may include inter alia provisions requiring any persons specified in the order "... to pay, or to make contributions in respect of, the cost of doing any work provided for by the order ..."

The order in question in this case is the Stopping Up of Highways (Bedfordshire) (No. 1) Order, 1949 (S.I. 1949, No. 2130). It recites the relevant parts of s. 49, and that the Minister is so satisfied

"... as regards the highways consisting of the greenways and footpaths in the rural district of Luton in the county of Bedford ... which are specified in Part I of the schedule to this order."

After a reference to s. 49 (2) and s. 49 (4), the order continues:

"It appears to the Minister to be expedient that provision should be made for the provision of the highways consisting of the greenways (hereinafter referred to as 'the new highways') which are specified in Part II of the schedule to this order. And whereas the provisions of sched. VI to the Act ... have been complied with," the Minister orders that certain old highways shall be stopped up and that new highways are to be provided by the Rugby Portland Cement Co., Ltd., who, with the Ministry of Transport, were respondents to the application before BIRKETT, J. Part I of the schedule to the order deals with the highways to be stopped up. There is the Drovers Way and the Wheelbarrow Green Highway and other ways with which we are not concerned. Part II of the schedule deals with the new, alternative, highways.

A The application for the development permission which led to this action was for the obtaining of chalk, and was made before the Act of 1947 was passed. However, under s. 77 (1) the permission has to be treated as having been given under Part III of the Act of 1947. The motion by the applicant, a Mr. Harlow, is made under s. 11 (2) of the Act, which provides that within a period of six weeks after the making of an order of this kind persons aggrieved can challenge its validity before the courts. The grounds on which the applicant contends that he is aggrieved and that the said order is not within the powers are:

B "that the said highway order deprives the applicant of his right to walk over the highways set out in Part I of the schedule thereof and that the said highway order is bad in law in that it is contrary to the provisions of the Regulation and Inclosure (Totternhoe) Provisional Orders Confirmation Act, 1886, and the award made thereunder and that the Minister has no power under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, or otherwise to override the aforesaid statutory provisions."

C The first question, therefore, is whether the Act of 1886 is overridden by the Minister's order. The principle invoked is a familiar one and the learned judge set it out ([1950] 1 All E.R. 901) in a citation from the speech of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in Seward v. Vera Cruz (1) (10 App. Cas. 68):

D " ' Now if anything be certain it is this, that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation, you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by force of such general words, without any indication of a particular intention to do so '."

E The main argument, as it would seem from the judgment below and the greater part of the argument here, proceeded on the basis that the Minister's order repealed or derogated from the Act of 1886. On that basis the question arose whether the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 118 (1), was a good answer. That sub-section provides:

F "For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that the provisions of this Act, and any restrictions or powers thereby imposed or conferred in relation to land, apply and may be exercised in relation to any land notwithstanding that provision is made by any enactment in force at the passing of this Act, or by any local Act passed at any time during the present session of Parliament, for authorising or regulating any development of the land."

G The definition of "enactment" in s. 119 (1) is:

" 'enactment' includes an enactment in any local or private Act of Parliament and an order, rule, regulation, bye-law or scheme made under an Act of Parliament."

H We are dealing, as will appear, with an Act confirming a provisional order under the Commons Act, 1876, which led, in accordance with the familiar procedure, to a valuer's award which is referred to in the notice of motion I have read. It was conceded on behalf of the applicant that he could not rely on anything except what was in the confirmed provisional order. i.e., that, if the only conflict was between the Minister's order and something in the award, he could not invoke with regard to that the principle formulated by the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in Seward's case (1), which I have quoted. The award would not have been seen and approved by Parliament, and the basis of the principle is that, as, in the earlier Act, Parliament expressed a special intention, the general intention in the later Act ought not to be regarded as overriding that special intention.

In considering what enactments authorise or regulate any development of the land we are sent to s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1947 which provides:

"In this Act, except where the context otherwise requires, the expression 'development' means the carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land, or the making of any material change in the use of any buildings or other land: Provided that the following operations or uses of land shall not be deemed for the purposes of this Act to involve development of the land ... (b) the carrying out by a local highway authority of any works required for the maintenance or improvement of a road, being works carried out on land within the boundaries of the road ..."

That proviso, I think, confirms the conclusion to which I would otherwise have come—that the making of a new road would be development. By proviso (e), the use of any land for the purposes of agriculture or forestry (including afforestation), and the use for any of those purposes of any building occupied together with land so used also is not to constitute development.

The first question, therefore, is whether the Act of 1886 entitles the applicant to invoke the principle that a later general Act does not override an earlier special Act. I have come to the conclusion that the applicant does not get over this, his first, difficulty. The Act of 1886 is:

"An Act to confirm the provisional order for the regulation of the commons, and the provisional order for the inclosure of the common fields, situated in the parish of Totternhoe ..."

The land with which we are concerned is that part of the area which was regulated as a common and not that part of the area which was inclosed. The Act recites that the Land Commissioners, in pursuance of the Inclosure Acts, 1845-1878, issued a provisional order in respect of inclosures and that the committee of the House of Commons recommended that the same should be confirmed, and it goes on:

"And whereas the said regulation and inclosure cannot be proceeded with without the previous authority of Parliament, [it is enacted that:] 1. The provisional order of regulation and the provisional order of inclosure set forth in the schedule to this Act are hereby confirmed."

In the schedule, there are the ordinary recitals, and a reference to a map which was deposited. The schedule provides:

"That the part of the said common to be regulated be the tracts known as the Dunstable Downs, Whipsnade Heath (so far as the same lies within the said parish), the cow common (except as hereinafter mentioned), and the Castle Hill, all of which are coloured light green on the map hereinbefore referred to, and also the several pieces of land, baulks, and driftways which are coloured dark green on the said map, and also, as part of the cow common, the three pieces of common field land which are severed by and lie to the north of the London and North-Western Railway, and are coloured yellow on the said map, in lieu of which that portion of the cow common which is severed by and lies to the south of the said railway, and is coloured pink on the said map, together with so much of the cow common at its eastern end as with the said portion shall, in the judgment of the said commissioners, be equal in value to the three pieces of common field land aforesaid, shall be included in the provisional order for inclosure as part of the common field land."

Before I come to the provisions of the order on which the matter turns, I should mention that there is no suggestion that anything in it is ultra vires the Commons Act, 1876. It is, perhaps, worth referring to the fact that the Commons Act, 1876, in setting out what can be done in the regulation of a common, by s. 5, which deals with improvements, provides:

A “The improvement of a common comprises for the purposes of this Act all or any of the following things; that is to say, (1) The draining, manuring, or levelling of the common . . .”

Section 7 provides:

B “In any provisional order in relation to a common, the Inclosure Commissioners shall, in considering the expediency of the application, take into consideration the question whether such application will be for the benefit of the neighbourhood, and shall, with a view to such benefit, insert in any such order such of the following terms and conditions (in this Act referred to as statutory provisions for the benefit of the neighbourhood) as are applicable to the case; that is to say, . . . (4) That carriage roads, bridle paths, and footpaths over such common are to be set out in such directions as may appear most commodious . . .”

C That would appear to give the commissioners power with regard to highways. I now come back to the Act of 1886. The schedule further provides:

“That, for ‘improvement’ the following provisions be put in force; that is to say, provisions for—The draining, manuring, and levelling of such part of the said common as may be found necessary,”

D and continues to deal with other matters, such as the planting of trees and so on, which are not material. Further on the schedule provides:

E “That, with a view to the benefit of the neighbourhood, the following provisions be made part of the terms and conditions of this order, that is to say: That Totternhoe Castle, and the ancient earthworks connected therewith, and the five tumuli on the Dunstable Downs, be preserved and maintained in their present state: That, so far as may be practicable, the ancient roads or tracks respectively known as ‘The Drovers Way’ and ‘The Icknield Way’ be preserved in their present condition . . .”

F In respect of the Drovers Way, which is one of the ways mentioned in Part I of sched. I to the order, that is the provision which is relied on. I myself think that the proper construction of that provision and the proper intention which the words convey is only to limit the power of the valuer when he comes to make his award. He has the general powers with regard to carriageways and so on which I have read from the Act, but this is to tell him that, though he has those powers, so far as practicable these ancient ways are to be preserved in their present condition. I can find no indication in these words to take the Drovers

G Way out of the general law as to highways as it existed at the time or as it might thereafter be enacted by Parliament. I do not myself think that that provision in this order would have precluded anybody from making an application to quarter sessions to stop up the Drovers Way under the procedure of the Highway Act, 1835. It is a short point and I do not know that I can elaborate it, but this would seem to me its effect and its intent. It is intended to limit what is to be done

H in the award, though even on that basis it is not categorical—it is only “so far as may be practicable.” It is a direction to the valuer as to how he is to exercise his powers, and in no sense purports to, nor does it, take these highways out of the general law.

The Wheelbarrow Greenway is not mentioned by name in the schedule, but it comes in under the following words:

“That there be reserved to the inhabitants of Totternhoe, and of the neighbouring towns and villages, and the public generally, at all times, a right of walking over all that part of the said common which is to be regulated, with the exception of the cow common, and that, in addition, there be reserved as aforesaid a right of playing games . . . ”

That brings in the definition which I have already read. The pieces in question are “ the several pieces of land, baulks and driftways which are coloured dark green.” Whereas if one reads this with the map, the words, I think, rather suggest that the public were to have a general right of walking in any direction over a considerable area, when one looks at the parts marked dark green in certain cases the right was over a way or footpath. The same conclusion which I have expressed in regard to the Drovers Way would also, in my opinion, apply to the Wheelbarrow Greenway, i.e., again it is a direction or an indication to the valuer how he is to exercise his powers, and I can find no words there which would take any of the ways or the places where there is a right of walking referred to in that paragraph out of the general law as to highways.

On this view the point decided by the learned judge does not arise, but I think it is right, as I am not satisfied that, if that point had arisen, I would have come to the same conclusion as the learned judge, that I should refer to what he says about it. He says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 903):

“ I have come to the conclusion that the order of the Minister ought not to have been made in respect of these matters. I am satisfied that ‘ development ’ in s. 118, as defined by s. 12, must be strictly construed, and I cannot think that in this Act of 1886 the ‘ development ’ was in any sense the ‘ carrying out of building, engineering, mining or other operations in, on, over or under land ’—which is the first head of the matter, or ‘ the making of any material change in the use of any land ’—which is the second head, and the head with which I am concerned. On the evidence before me, it would not appear that any material change had been made, or, indeed, any change at all, but that, so far as the Drovers Way, the Wheelbarrow Green highway, and the Quarry Green highway, the three highways specified in the Minister’s order, are concerned, it would appear, not that there had been any development within the meaning of s. 12, but that there has merely been a maintenance of the existing use.”

The map, I understand, only appeared at the last moment, and it may be that in this court we were rather more fully informed than was the learned judge with regard to what exactly had happened. I personally was satisfied that these ways, or parts of them, were, under the directions in this order, diverted, and, possibly, in one place continued, and, I think, there would be a forcible argument that, if this authorised the making of a way in a new place and if it was shown that that was done, that would be development. There were other and wider arguments put forward suggesting that this order fell within s. 118 of the Act of 1947, even if there had been no alteration in the ancient way. I do not propose to deal with them, because, they are complicated and no decision on them is necessary in this case. For the reasons which I have given I think these appeals should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: In the old days, in order to stop up or divert a highway it was necessary to go through the procedure laid down in the Highway Act, 1835, and most of us remember the rather complicated set of documents which an application to quarter sessions entailed. Nowadays, the Minister of Transport can do it, so long as he goes through the procedure laid down by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. He can override any previous Acts of Parliament which have authorised or regulated the “ development ” of the land, but he cannot override the specific provisions of any other Acts. If he desires to stop up or divert an ancient highway, such as a Roman road, which has been left untouched by Parliament, he can do so by going through the necessary procedure. If he desires to stop up or divert a modern highway, such as a trunk road made under the authority of Parliament, he can likewise do so, because the Acts which authorise the making of new roads are, undoubtedly, Acts which authorise the development of the land on which they are made. It is, however, said that he cannot stop up or divert this ancient Drovers Way because Parliament has ordered it to be preserved "so far as practicable."

A I wish to confine what I have to say to the small strip which is part of the old Drovers Way. If the Act of 1886 had specifically and imperatively provided that the Drovers Way should be preserved in its existing condition without any diversion or stopping up, I do not think the Minister could have overruled it, because I quite agree with BIRKETT, J., that the Act of 1886 was not an enactment for authorising or regulating the development of the land within s. 118 of the Act of 1947. I think that "the land" in that section means the particular
B piece of land over which the Minister desires to exercise his powers, that is, in this case, the soil of the old Drovers Way. I do not think that any part of the Act of 1886 or the schedule thereto authorised or regulated the development of that piece of soil. It simply preserved its existing use as a public way. The order did, no doubt, contain a general power to drain and level land which would include the soil of the Drovers Way, but that would only be maintenance, not
C development.

I think, however, that this appeal should be allowed on a point which was not specifically argued before BIRKETT, J. In my opinion, the Act of 1886 was not so precise and definite about the Drovers Way that it took precedence over any general Act. I am quite sure that Parliament did not intend that the Drovers Way should be exempt from diversion under the Highway Act, 1835. All that
D it intended was that "so far as practicable" it should be preserved. That left it subject to the general legislation for the stopping up or diversion of highways. If this special Act did not override the existing general legislation it cannot be supposed to override subsequent general legislation. In my opinion, therefore, the powers of the Minister to stop up or divert highways extend not only to ancient common law highways and to new statutory highways, but also to high-
E ways set out or confirmed under the Commons and Inclosures Acts. The appeals should be allowed.

VAISEY, J.: I agree that these appeals succeed. As we are differing from the learned judge in the court below, I ought, perhaps, to try to add a few words of my own, but, finding myself in complete accord with everything that has
F fallen from my Lords, and being fully satisfied that there is no part of the ground which they have not completely covered, I content myself with expressing my concurrence in the order proposed.

NOTE.

SHARP v. MINISTER OF PENSIONS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), October 13, 1950.]

War Pension—Tribunal requiring report of specialist—Report favourable to claimant—Minister obtaining report of independent medical expert—Tribunal's rejection of claim based on report to Minister—Validity of procedure—Pensions Appeal Tribunals (England and Wales) Rules, 1946 (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 1708/L.22), r. 15 (2), (3)—Royal Warrant concerning Retired Pay, Pensions, etc., 1949 (Cmd. 7699), art. 4 (2).

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against the decision of a pensions appeal tribunal sitting at Leeds on Dec. 19, 1949. The tribunal disallowed the applicant's appeal from the rejection by the Minister of his claim to a pension on the ground that the condition from which the applicant was suffering, viz., diabetes, was not caused, or aggravated, by war service.

The tribunal, being in doubt at the conclusion of the evidence, called for further examination of the applicant by a medical specialist and for a report on his condition. A copy of the report, which was favourable to the applicant, was sent to the Minister. The Minister then obtained an independent report from another specialist, and included this second report in his notes and comments on the first report. The tribunal accepted the second report and dismissed the appeal. On the question whether the Minister was entitled to ask for an independent report at that particular stage of the case, THE COURT now held that the Minister, by attaching the opinion of an independent medical specialist, had made comment in accordance with the terms of r. 15 (3) of the Pensions Appeal Tribunals (England and Wales) Rules, 1946, and there was nothing in the Royal Warrant concerning Retired Pay, Pensions, etc., 1949 (Cmd. 7699), which limited the right of the Minister to seek the opinion of an independent medical specialist before the stage of certification.

J. P. Ashworth for the Minister of Pensions.

Per ORMEROD, J. : It may very well be that, having referred a question of this kind to a medical specialist for a report under r. 15 (2) of the rules of 1946, an applicant may feel that, if a further report, contrary to the earlier one, is produced by the Minister which appears to influence the tribunal in a way which is adverse to the applicant, he has not been fairly treated. It is advisable that that state of affairs should not arise if possible . . . I am anxious, as everyone is, that the impression should be given that these matters are conducted in a way which gives the applicant for a pension every chance of putting his case as fully and as fairly as possible before the various tribunals before which he has a right to have his case heard.

Re DULLES' SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. DULLES v. VIDLER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 23, 24, 25, 1950.]

Infant—Maintenance—Father foreign citizen resident abroad—Submission of father to jurisdiction of High Court.

Practice—Originating summons—Guardianship of infant—Form—Parties—Condition of making order for maintenance that mother should have applied for custody—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (c. 27), s. 5—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925 (c. 45), s. 3 (2)—R.S.C., Ord. 55A, r. 2, r. 3.

The mother of an infant applied by summons for custody of the infant (a ward of court) under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5, and for an order against the father for maintenance under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1925, s. 3 (2). The father, an American citizen, was at all material times resident outside the jurisdiction. The court made an order for custody, but made no order for maintenance on the ground that the father had never submitted to the jurisdiction because he had never resided in England. On appeal, HELD: as a general rule and apart from any special statutory provision, it was not necessary that submission to the jurisdiction should be by personal presence in England, but submission could be effected by the party in question becoming an active party to litigation before the English courts; there was no such special provision in the Acts of 1886 and 1925 as would prevent a submission otherwise than by actual physical presence in England; and, therefore, the court had jurisdiction to consider whether, on the facts, the husband had submitted.

Forsyth v. Forsyth ([1947] 2 All E.R. 623), distinguished and explained.

The summons was entitled in the matter of a settlement made between the mother, of the one part, and two other persons (trustees), of the other part. The parties referred to in the title were the infant (plaintiff) and the trustees (defendants). The summons was further entitled in the matter of an infant and in the matter of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925. Neither the mother nor the father was a party to the action. The body of the summons read: "Let all parties concerned attend before the learned master on the hearing of an application on the part of the infant by the mother, his next friend, for an order (i) that the mother may be appointed guardian, and that custody of the infant may be given to the mother; (ii) that such provision may be made for the maintenance of the infant as to the court may seem fit." The summons was addressed to the father. The order made on the summons recited the summons, referred to counsel, the writ and the affidavit, and ordered "that the custody of the infant plaintiff be committed to the mother until further order." No order was made as to costs. It was argued for the husband that it was a condition precedent to an order under s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925 that an order should have been made for custody on the mother's application under s. 5 of the Act of 1886, and, having regard to the form of the summons, that condition had not been complied with.

HELD: for procedural purposes R.S.C., Ord. 55A, r. 2 and r. 3, contemplated that an application in the name of the infant by its mother as next friend was to be treated as an application by the mother under s. 5, and, therefore, the condition must be considered to have been performed.

APPEAL by an infant from an order of ROMER, J., dated July 28, 1950, made on a summons by which it was asked that the infant's mother be appointed guardian of the infant, and that provision might be made for the maintenance of the infant. ROMER, J., made an order committing the infant to the custody of the mother, but held that he had no jurisdiction to order the husband, who was an American citizen not residing in England, to maintain the infant. The relevant facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.

M. J. Albery for the infant.

Bonner and C. P. Hutchinson for the father.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: It is not open to doubt as a matter of principle that English statutes will be treated as not intended, in the absence of language to the contrary, to assert any jurisdiction beyond English territory. The general principle is stated in Ex p. Blain, Re Savers (1), and later in the House of Lords in Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co. (2). Both were cases arising under the then bankruptcy legislation, and in both the question was whether certain foreign individuals were "debtors" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Acts so as to be liable to bankruptcy proceedings. In both cases the foreign individual had been served with proceedings, and had appeared to protest. It appears that in the second case, according to the report in the court below ([1900] 1 Q.B. 541), he had also challenged the allegations in the petition, but from the opinions in the House it does not appear that any point was taken that he had by appearance or taking steps in the proceedings purported to submit to the jurisdiction. I should like to read a passage from the judgment of JAMES, L.J., in Ex p. Blain (1) which has been cited many times, and by the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., in Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co. (2). JAMES, L.J., said (12 Ch.D. 526):

"It appears to me that the whole question is governed by the broad, general, universal principle that English legislation, unless the contrary is expressly enacted or so plainly implied as to make it the duty of an English court to give effect to an English statute, is applicable only to English subjects or to foreigners who by coming into this country, whether for a long or a short time, have made themselves during that time subject to English jurisdiction. Every foreigner who comes into this country, for however limited a time, is, during his residence here within the allegiance of the Sovereign, entitled to the protection of the Sovereign and subject to all the laws of the Sovereign. But, if a foreigner remains abroad, if he has never come into this country at all, it seems to me impossible to imagine that the English legislature could have ever intended to make such a man subject to particular English legislation."

BRETT, L.J., gave judgment to the same effect, and similarly COTTON, L.J. I only observe one short passage in the judgment of COTTON, L.J., where he says (ibid., 532):

"Of course it is right that questions of title to such property should be adjudicated upon here, and there may well be English statutes giving our courts power to deal with suits relating to the title to real property in England as regards aliens, and for the purpose of serving them. But that is a very different thing from saying that you shall deal with a foreigner who has never been here, and has never submitted himself to the English Act of Parliament, in the special subject of bankruptcy to which this Act refers."

I should add that, as also appears from the judgments in Ex p. Blain (1) and the opinions in the House of Lords in Cooke v. Vogeler (Charles A.) Co. (2), in dealing with a matter of bankruptcy there is, of course, a special reason
A for taking care not to assert a greater jurisdiction than the statute clearly justifies, since the bankruptcy procedure is intended to involve the administration of all the assets of the debtor for the benefit of all his creditors. Nothing that I propose to say is meant as any qualification of the passages I have read, or of the views expressed in those judgments, which are well established authority.

B There is, however, another principle (which involves no such qualification), viz., that, generally speaking, an individual who ordinarily would be beyond the scope of the English legislation construed according to the first principle may, nevertheless, voluntarily submit himself to that jurisdiction and make himself amenable to the particular law. The obvious way in which that may be done is indicated in the passages from the judgments I have read, viz., by

C coming to this country and being here, albeit for a short time, and thereby rendering himself amenable to the statute, but it seems to me that personal presence here is not, as a matter of good sense and principle, the only way whereby an individual may render himself amenable to the particular legislation. It would appear to be strange if a man, by coming and being physically here for a week, was amenable to the particular legislation, but if, while he
D stayed just outside these shores, he chose to be represented by solicitors and counsel and fought on its merits for a long period of time some piece of litigation, he must be held never to have effectually submitted himself to the jurisdiction. It does not seem to me that anything in the language I have read can be taken to have laid it down that effectual submission was only to be derived from actual physical presence or residence on English territory.

E On the other hand, it is, undoubtedly, also true that a particular statute may by its character and its terms make plain that it is intended to confer only a limited and circumscribed jurisdiction—limited and circumscribed either by reference to a particular subject-matter or subject-matters, or by reference to the categories of individuals who may be subject to the jurisdiction, or both. That kind of case is best illustrated by the position of what are called

F inferior courts. As ASQUITH, L.J., observed during the course of the argument, no kind of submission by the parties to a dispute could confer on a county court jurisdiction to decide a libel action. Judges are not entitled to become arbitrators, and, in the exercise of their judicial office, county court judges could not by any means determine a libel action. Again, our inferior courts, county courts and justices' courts, are limited by express language of relevant statutes

G as regards the persons over whom they may exercise jurisdiction. Thus, broadly speaking, a county court's jurisdiction is confined to persons who have a residence within a specified area, and the same is true of justices' courts. If, therefore, the person sought to be sued in those inferior courts does not fall within the category of persons over whom alone, by definition, the inferior court has jurisdiction, no amount of submission on the part of an individual
H will operate to extend the jurisdiction which Parliament has thought fit to limit.

That particular aspect of the matter came recently under the consideration of this court in Forsyth v. Forsyth (3). The question was whether a certain justices' court had had jurisdiction over a husband, defendant to a complaint by his wife, who appeared to have been at all material times domiciled and resident in Scotland. It was said that he had been represented by an advocate who, in the course of the proceedings, had cross-examined or asked questions of the wife, and on that ground it was suggested that he must be taken to have submitted to the jurisdiction and so given power to the justices to hear and determine the case. In reference to that point, TUCKER, L.J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 624):

"Secondly, it was contended that, even if the husband was, in fact, domiciled and resident in Scotland, he had submitted to the jurisdiction of the justices by reason of the fact that his solicitor had appeared before the justices and cross-examined the wife, and that, accordingly, he could not now be heard to complain of lack of jurisdiction."

After referring to certain authorities relied on in support of that assertion the learned lord justice said (ibid.):

"Such cases have no application to courts of inferior jurisdiction in this country which derive their jurisdiction from statute. If such an inferior court lacks jurisdiction, parties cannot by agreement or otherwise confer jurisdiction on it."

The main question raised in the present appeal is whether (subject to what I shall say hereafter as to the form of the application), the principle that where a statute confers a limited and circumscribed jurisdiction it cannot be enlarged by the parties by agreement or otherwise applies in the present case which has arisen on an application to the High Court under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925. For the purposes of this part of my judgment I will assume that this application, which came before ROMER, J., was an application by the mother of the infant asking, first, for the custody of the infant pursuant to the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, s. 5, and also for an order against the father of the infant for maintenance under s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925. The father is, and has at all material times been, resident outside the English jurisdiction. He is an American citizen, and he has never submitted to the jurisdiction in the sense of having come here personally and lived here. In those circumstances, though the judge made an order for custody, when the matter of maintenance came to be considered he said that, though he would have been disposed to make some order for the maintenance of the child, he felt himself bereft of the necessary jurisdiction, and he thought that the language which I have read from the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., was applicable to this case although we are here concerned, not with an inferior court, but with the High Court.

The question we have to consider (and I confess I have found it a difficult one) is whether that view ought to be supported. I have come to the conclusion, with all respect to the learned judge, that he had the jurisdiction, the absence of which he so regretted. If I have correctly stated the principles, the matter, I think, depends on the construction of the statutes I have mentioned. If on a fair reading of those statutes it appears that the jurisdiction to award maintenance is intended only to be exercised on fathers who either are English subjects or English residents strictly so called, then I conceive it would follow (apart, perhaps, from some matter of estoppel) that an individual who was not an English subject or not an English resident could not enlarge the Parliamentary jurisdiction, and I think counsel for the infant concedes as much.

I, therefore, turn to the Acts. I think it is unnecessary to go section by section through the whole of them. The first thing to note, as it seems to me, is that, as counsel for the father conceded, the infant concerned over whom, or in respect of whom, jurisdiction can properly be exercised may well not be the child of English parents. Plainly, the infant would have to be here if any effective order was going to be made in regard to its custody, but it may well be, and many cases must be known to all who practise in these matters, that the infant may not be an English subject. From that it will follow that the fathers and mothers who are contemplated by the Act may not be English subjects. That does not answer the question whether the fathers or mothers must be otherwise amenable to the jurisdiction, but, if the scheme of the Act contemplates making orders in respect of the children of foreign parents in certain circumstances, there seems, at any rate from the scheme of the Act, no particular reason for confining its jurisdiction to parents who have either permanently or casually been resident in England. The matter can be taken a little further, because, by s. 9 of the Act of 1886, there is a definition of what is meant by "the court." It provides:

"... the expression 'the court' shall mean—in England the High Court or the county court of the district in which the respondent or respondents or any of them may reside."

That, of course, reflects the limited jurisdiction by reference to areas of the county courts, but still it is to be noted that the qualification of residence, expressed naturally and properly as regards the county court, does not appear in regard to the High Court. I should, therefore, prima facie, take it that this Act (and the same is true of the Act of 1925) was intended to have no less or more operation than any other Act of Parliament (where no express provisions are found in regard to this matter), namely, that it would be available against any person in the High Court who was, for any reason, amenable to the jurisdiction of the High Court.

On the other hand, attention was drawn (and the learned judge placed some reliance on this) to s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1925, which provides:

"Any person for the time being under an obligation to make payments in pursuance of any order for the payment of money under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, as amended by this Act, shall give notice of any change of address to such person (if any) as may be specified in the order, and any person failing without reasonable excuse to give such a notice shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine . . ."

That, it is said, indicates that any person against whom an order is made to make payment—and that would plainly cover the case of a father ordered to make the payment mentioned in s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925—has to be a person in regard to whom it would be sensible to make those provisions about notifying changes of address and imposing criminal liability in default. But s. 8 (1) is not, be it noted, of universal application. It simply provides that any person so ordered is to give notice of any change of address to such person, if any, as the order may specify. If the individual were not resident in England there would be no point, prima facie, in specifying such a person or making any such requirement. In the ordinary case of an English subject or an English resident, it would, no doubt, be usual and proper, but it is conceded that residence for quite a short time would bring a father within the scope of the Act, and in such a case it would be no more sensible to make an order under s. 8 than it would be to make it in regard to a person who, though not resident, was acting through-out by a solicitor. I, therefore, think that no great point can be made of s. 8 (1).

Reading the Act as a whole, I am unable to conclude that the intendment of these two statutes is such that only fathers who are either subjects of this country, or personally resident permanently or for a short time in this country, are intended to be covered by the jurisdiction. I think these statutes must be treated as any other statute (which contains no special provision in this regard), so that the jurisdiction will be properly enlarged to the extent that, if anyone chooses voluntarily to submit to the jurisdiction, there is nothing in principle in the Act which prevents a court exercising that jurisdiction. If the word "father" has to be qualified in s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925, it seems to me it is sufficient qualification to say it means a father amenable by any means to the jurisdiction of the English court. I, therefore, with all respect to the learned judge, think that there is no such limitation to be derived from the Act as prevents a submission otherwise than by actual physical presence here, and I do not think the matter is concluded by Forsyth v. Forsyth (3) for, in my opinion, the reference in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J., to "inferior court" was of the essence of his decision, which, accordingly, is applicable only in reference to inferior courts.

I think, therefore, that the learned judge had jurisdiction provided that he found that the father here had submitted to the jurisdiction. That last question may, however, be one of considerable difficulty. As may be imagined where, unhappily, husband and wife have fallen apart, the proceedings are of a somewhat hostile character. I gather that there were here considerable delays. It is said that the father, who throughout was represented by solicitors authorised to accept service of any proceedings, asked for an adjournment to enable him to file evidence. There is some divergence of recollection between learned counsel on some part of what occurred before ROMER, J.

There is further this difficulty. I have said that I should have to deal with the form of the application, and now I think is the proper time to do it. Under what I conceive to be the modern practice, the summons (issued as long ago as June, 1948) was entitled first in the matter of a settlement made between the mother, of the one part, and two persons, who I think are grandparents, or one of them is a grandparent, of the other part. That, as is clear from the evidence, was a settlement of a small sum of money, a common device in order that the child should become by the appropriate proceedings a ward of court. Then the parties to the action are stated as being, first, the infant, who is the plaintiff, and the two trustees, the defendants, neither mother nor father being parties to the action. The next heading is "In the matter of an infant," and then, finally, "In the matter of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925." The summons is of the kind known as not inter partes and runs thus:

"Let all parties concerned attend before the learned master on the hearing of an application on the part of the infant by the mother, his next friend, for an order () that the mother may be appointed guardian, and that custody of the infant may be given to the mother; (ii) that such provision may be made for the maintenance of the infant as to the court may seem fit."

By amendment some fortnight later, there is added at the foot "to the father," and the name of the father's solicitors. The summons was served on the father, and service was accepted by the solicitors named. Where matters of jurisdiction arise in an ordinary action by writ or by originating summons, there is an opportunity for the party seeking to dispute the jurisdiction to make a proper application appearing under protest for the purpose of raising the issue. On the form of proceeding in this case a foreign individual so served is in rather greater difficulty. In the first place, so far as the application was for custody, he, the father, desired to place before the English court, for reasons which it is not necessary for me to pursue, various considerations which he could only do effectively by putting in evidence and attending by representatives for argument. On the issue of custody the question of jurisdiction did not arise. It is said that the father was almost bound to take some steps in the matter if he had any kind of feeling for his own child, but under the Acts the right of the court to make an order against the father for maintenance is dependent on an order first being made for custody. The form of the summons, though headed in the matter of the Guardianship of Infants Acts, may be said to be somewhat general and vague as regards the relief sought, for it asks in para. 2 "that such provision shall be made for the maintenance of the infant as to the court may seem fit." It is said on behalf of the father: "Assuming that that was an application for maintenance under the Guardianship of Infants Acts, what was I to do and when was I to do it?" I do not think it is for this court to suggest any answer to that question. I am relating these facts to show that the question whether, according to ordinary principles, there had, at this stage, been a submission is a difficult one which must depend on a review of the whole of the circumstances in this case. The infant's advisers very properly have limited the material which this court has to portions only of what appear to have been about fourteen affidavits, the exhibits to which extended, we are informed, to very many pages. In the last paragraph of the statement exhibited to the mother's first affidavit she says:

"I am willing to act as guardian to the infant and respectfully ask the court to appoint me his guardian or to give me custody. In addition I ask that an order for maintenance of the infant be made against the father for the sum of "

so much per annum, less certain other sums. It is said on the mother's behalf: "If you saw and read that evidence it must have been as plain to you as could be that the mother here was coming and asking for an order under the Act of 1925 for maintenance, and in face of that you litigated the whole question. Indeed, the whole matter was highly controversial from start to finish."

On those facts is the right inference to draw that the father did submit to the jurisdiction? Taking the view which the learned judge did, it was unnecessary for him to answer that question. I wondered at first whether the expression of his regret intimated that he would have held that there had been a submission, but I do not feel able to say from a reading of the note of his judgment whether that was so or not, and I think the question is primarily one with which the learned judge must deal. Both from the form of the proceedings and other matters, it certainly appears clear that counsel for the husband intimated at quite an early stage that on this aspect of it he wished to raise this jurisdiction point. It may well be there was no other convenient opportunity for him to do so. All that, however, as I think, is a matter pre-eminently for the learned judge who has all the materials available to him (including the assistance, if necessary, of the master) and who heard the argument. He is better able, in the circumstances, than this court to express a conclusion on the matter.

There remains, however, one final point which has been described as technical. I have said that by the terms of s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925 an order for maintenance against the father can only be made when there has first been made an order for custody under s. 5 of the Act of 1886. That section, so far as material, provides:

"The court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant (who may apply without next friend), make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant . . ."

The point made is that this was not an application by the mother, nor was the order made an order under that section or on the application of the mother at all. I have read the summons and the order made followed the summons, and also followed the form which is now, I think, usual in these difficult infant cases. The titles are all reproduced in the order, though we are told (and it does appear) that in the course of filing the supporting affidavits, whether from economy, absent-mindedness, or other reasons, some of the titles appear to come and go. The order recites the summons, refers to counsel and the affidavits, and then says:

"It is ordered that the custody of the infant plaintiff be committed to the mother until further order," and the judge does not make any order as to costs. Now, has the condition precedent to a maintenance order been established, or is counsel for the husband right in saying that no order for custody under the statute of 1886 was made, and that, therefore, whatever the answer to the main point of jurisdiction may be, the court cannot make a maintenance order against the husband? The matter is troublesome, and all the more so because I think the procedure which has now become well established in the Chancery Division and is derived from the present rules has, perhaps, somewhat lost sight of the original foundation for the jurisdiction. Under the Act of 1886 it was contemplated that application should be made by the mother. If the mother was dead, it was to be made by the guardian, and there was also, under s. 2, general jurisdiction, where there was no guardian, for the court to appoint guardians, and so on. Then power was given by rule to determine the procedure. We have seen the older precedents in DANIELS CHANCERY FORMS, 5th ed. I have also been able to refer to DANIELS CHANCERY PRACTICE, 8th ed. In the latter book it is stated (p. 1926) that the old rules provide that, where application was made under s. 2, it would be proper to make it by the infant through a next friend, but it states, following the terms of the section, that applications under s. 5 would be made, where proper, by the mother, and, if the mother were dead, by guardian, or if the application were pursuant to the last two lines of the section, by the infant, again through his next friend. There was, therefore, a distinction in the rules between applications under s. 2 and applications under s. 5. It is not, however, without significance that, if one looks at the old forms, the example given for an application under s. 5 is a summons by the mother, but the application is treated as having been headed not only in the matter of the Acts, but also in the matter of the infant by his next friend. If a mother were appointed next friend, the position would be that the summons was entitled in the matter of the infant by the mother as next friend, though the mother would make the application. When one comes to the modern rules which followed the making of the Act of 1925, it is clear that the practice of the Chancery Division had become more settled. R.S.C., Ord. 55A, r. 2, provides:

“Any application under either the Act of 1886 or the Act of 1925 may be disposed of in chambers by a judge of the Chancery Division and may be made” by summons in the action where there is a pending action, and, where there is no pending action, by originating summons. Rule 3 provides:

“A summons under r. 2 of this order may be taken out by the infant (by a next friend) or by any other person interested in the relief sought and shall be served . . .”

It is to be observed, therefore, that no longer is any distinction drawn between summonses under s. 2 and s. 5. The rules seem to contemplate that any summons, including summonses under s. 5, may be taken out not only by the mother, but by an infant by a next friend, or by any other person interested. Fortunately, we are not concerned with what the position would be if an application were taken out under s. 5 of the Act of 1886 by some person interested other than the infant itself, or other than the infant's mother. There seems no doubt that for procedural purposes the rules contemplate that an application in the name of the infant by its mother as next friend is to be treated as an application by the mother within the terms of s. 5. I have referred to para. 9 of the mother's statement from which it is plain that she is herself asking for the relief (a) of custody, and (b) of maintenance. When the order was made it was expressed (at any rate according to the heading), among other things, to be made under the Acts, and, therefore, if properly made, must have been treated, so far as custody is concerned, as an order for custody on the application of the mother, which, of course, in substance it was. It may be that, at some time, consideration might be given to seeing to what extent the rules are strictly in conformity with the terms of the Acts, but for present purposes I have come to the conclusion that the present application ought to be treated as being an application within the terms of s. 5 by the mother, although procedurally in accordance with the rules and modern practice it was made strictly by the infant acting through its mother as the infant's next friend. I, therefore, do not think that the objection which has been suggested on this head ought to be sustained.

A I come back for a moment to the original point, and one final consideration I would like to add. If the judge had no jurisdiction, then prima facie he had no jurisdiction to order the husband in any circumstances to pay any costs. He could only do that on the terms that he had submitted. His order did not make provision for costs, but it would seem to me a very startling thing if an individual can come, as this husband did, take part for two years or so in highly contentious litigation which is probably very costly, and then be in a position to say: "The court has no jurisdiction over me whatever. It cannot order me to give security for costs, and certainly it cannot order me to pay them." B I think that consideration is relevant to the point in hand. As a matter of principle, where a man has so acted as to make it plain that he does submit and renders himself amenable, that is sufficient to confer under this Act jurisdiction over him, although he does not ever set foot on these shores. I must C not, however, be taken to be pre-judging the question whether he has in this case submitted. That is a matter, as I have said, which ROMER, J., is far better able to decide, and I think, therefore, in allowing this appeal, we should refer the matter back, intimating our view that he has jurisdiction to deal with the matter if he thinks there was a submission.

D ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. The proposition contended for on behalf of the father is that, where jurisdiction is conferred by a special statute on an English superior court, a foreigner resident abroad cannot submit to that jurisdiction effectively by any conduct other than coming to this country. That seems to me contrary to principle, and also to the reasoning on which the court proceeded in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (4). It is true that in that case the immunity was claimed by a foreign sovereign and E not merely by a foreigner resident abroad as such, but, in my view, the doctrine of submission, if it applies to the first must logically also apply to the second, and the court, though it found on the facts that the sovereign had not submitted, clearly held that he could have done so without coming to this country, and none the less so because the jurisdiction involved was that conferred by a special statute, namely, the Arbitration Act, 1889. Whether the conduct of F the father in this case did amount to submission is a question of fact which the learned judge, taking a different view of the law from that which my Lord has expressed, and which I share, found it unnecessary to decide and which on existing materials we cannot decide either. I agree that the case should be remitted to him for that issue to be determined.

G On the other point, that maintenance cannot be claimed under s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1925 because the condition precedent laid down by s. 5 of the Act of 1886, viz., application by the mother, has not been satisfied, I also agree with my Lord and have nothing to add to his reasons. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree and do not desire to add anything.

H Appeal allowed: costs of appeal and proceedings below to be in the discretion of the judge after trying the further question to be determined by him.

PEARLBERG v. MAY.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 13, November 1, 1950.]

Sale of Land—Interest on purchase price—Purchaser in possession before completion—Failure to complete—Payment of purchase money into court—Liability of purchaser to pay interest from date of lodgment until completion.

On Nov. 24, 1948, P. successfully bid at an auction for certain real property, and signed a memorandum of the purchase affixed to the auction particulars containing the special conditions of sale. The special conditions provided that the property was sold subject to the National Conditions of Sale, 14th ed., so far as not inconsistent with the special conditions, and that completion should take place on Jan. 12, 1949, when the balance of the purchase money was to be paid. If the balance was not so paid, the special conditions provided, it was to carry interest at five per cent. per annum until payment, with an option to the vendor to take the rents and profits in lieu. Clause 5 of the National Conditions provided that, on failure to complete on the day fixed, the balance of the purchase money was to bear interest at the rate provided by the special conditions, provided that a purchaser not in default and not in possession might avoid payment of interest by placing the purchase money on deposit. Clause 6 of the National Conditions provided that, if the purchaser be let into possession before actual completion, then, as from the date of his taking possession and until actual completion, or until he gave up possession to the vendor, he should pay interest on the remainder of the purchase money at the rate of four per cent. per annum. Completion was postponed by agreement until May 10, 1949, when the purchaser paid part only of the purchase money. The vendor gave notice of his intention to re-sell, and on May 16, 1949, the purchaser issued a writ claiming specific performance and an injunction restraining the re-sale. On June 9, 1949, by which date the purchaser had been let into possession, the vendor moved the court for an order that the purchaser pay into court the balance of the purchase money and interest or that the action be dismissed. The purchaser did not file any evidence or appear on the motion, and on June 21, 1949, the purchaser was ordered to pay the unpaid balance with interest at four per cent. from June 10, 1949, to the day of lodgment, and in default to deliver up possession of the property to the vendor on or before July 5, 1949. The purchaser remained in possession and paid the moneys into court as directed. The vendor now claimed that the purchaser was liable to pay interest at five per cent. per annum on the balance of the purchase money during the period for which the money was lodged in court.

HELD: the lodgment in court did not deprive the vendor of his right to interest at the contractual rate of five per cent. per annum although he must give credit for any interest received from the Paymaster-General in respect of the deposited sum.

B ACTION.

The purchaser of certain freehold property claimed specific performance of two contracts for sale appertaining thereto, and an injunction restraining the vendor from re-selling the property. After the delivery of the statement of claim, the vendor moved the court for an order that the purchaser pay into court the balance of the purchase money or that the action be dismissed.

C Pursuant to the order on motion the purchaser paid the balance into court, and the question arose whether, having regard to the provisions of the contract, the purchaser was bound to pay interest on the moneys paid into court from the date of lodgment until the date of completion.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 1. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. This is a purchaser's action for specific performance arising out of two contracts entered into by the purchaser by virtue of bids at an auction held on Nov. 24, 1948, at which the property in question was put up for sale in two lots, on the vendor's (the defendant's) instructions. The property is described and special conditions of sale are contained in printed auction particulars at the end of which is a memorandum recording the purchase. The purchaser purchased both lots at the auction at a total price of £33,925 and she paid to the vendor's agents deposits amounting to £3,392 10s. 0d. The special conditions provided among other things that the property was sold subject to the National Conditions of Sale, 14th ed., so far as not varied by or inconsistent with the special conditions, and, by condition 3 (a), fixed completion for Jan. 12, 1949, when the balance of the purchase money was to be paid, and, if not so paid, was to carry interest at five per cent. until payment, with an option to the vendor to take the rents and profits in lieu.

E By cl. 5 of the National Conditions it is provided that, on failure to complete on the day fixed, the balance of the purchase money is to bear interest at the rate provided by the special conditions until the date of actual completion, with a proviso entitling a purchaser not in default and not having been let into possession to avoid the payment of interest by depositing his purchase money as there provided. Clause 6 of the National Conditions provides that, if the purchaser be let into possession before actual completion, then, as from the date of his taking possession and until actual completion, or until he gives up possession to the vendor, he shall pay interest on the remainder of the purchase money at the rate of four per cent. per annum.

H The purchase in the present case has never been brought to actual completion, and the rights and wrongs of the parties in that regard were in dispute until, at any rate, the delivery of the defence and counterclaim by the vendor, in June, 1949. Completion was postponed by agreement until May 10, 1949, the purchaser paying a further £10,000 of the purchase money. Thereafter, as a result of notice given by the vendor of his intention to re-sell, the writ was issued on May 16, 1949, the purchaser asking for specific performance and an injunction to restrain a re-sale.

In her statement of claim the purchaser alleged that since May 10, 1949, she had always been ready to complete, but that the vendor was in default by reason of his failure to give vacant possession. By way of defence and counterclaim the vendor also asked for specific performance, alleging default on the part of the purchaser. On June 9, 1949, immediately after the delivery of the statement of claim, the vendor moved the court for an order on the purchaser to pay into court the balance of the purchase money and interest thereon, amounting to £20,832 7s. 0d., or, alternatively, that the action be dismissed. This motion was not in the ordinary form in such a case in that it did not ask that the purchaser should lodge the purchase money in court or go out of possession. The motion was, however, treated as though this had been its object. It was supported by an affidavit alleging that the purchaser had been let into possession of the property on Jan. 12, 1949, and had so remained ever since.

The purchaser did not choose to file any evidence in answer or to appear on the motion and on June 21, 1949, an order was made in these terms:

"Let the [purchaser] on or before July 5, 1949, lodge in court £20,832 7s. 0d., being the unpaid balance of the purchase money and interest to June 9, 1949 (together with interest on the principal sum of £20,532 10s. 0d. at four per cent. per annum from June 10, 1949, to the day of lodgment) for the freehold property known as Cams Hill, Fareham, in the county of Hampshire, and land adjoining thereto in the said writ mentioned. And in default of the plaintiff so lodging the said sum within the time aforesaid let the plaintiff on or before July 5, 1949, deliver up to the defendant possession of the said property."

The purchaser, by submitting to this order, must be taken to have admitted that she had been let into possession on Jan. 12, 1949, and she did, in fact, elect on that footing to retain possession and to lodge in court the sums directed by the order. The denials in her reply delivered on June 22, 1949, can make no difference.

It would appear that no further step has been taken in the action, and I need only record that on May 8, 1950, the purchaser, by her solicitors, agreed to pay the costs of both action and counterclaim, thus admitting the justice of the vendor's case and the failure of her own. It has since then been recognised that there is now no obstacle to an actual completion except the dispute on which I have to adjudicate, which is whether, having regard to the lodgment in court of the purchase money which I have mentioned, there has been any liability on the purchaser since that date to pay interest on the balance of the purchase money at the contractual rate of five per cent., or whether the vendor's rights in that respect are limited to receiving the fund in court together with whatever interest it may have earned on deposit in the Pay Office. It is the purchaser's contention that, the vendor having for his own security chosen to have the balance due lodged in court, the order in that behalf is equivalent to the payment of the purchase money by her, and that, she having been deprived of the money in this way, is not bound to pay interest on a sum that has not been in her hands. The vendor, on the other hand, relies on the terms of the contract which provide for payment of interest until the date of actual completion, a day which admittedly has not yet arrived, and he argues that the lodgment in court which the purchaser was compelled to make was merely a term on which she was allowed by the court to retain possession of the property before completion, and is no more than a security to the vendor for the ultimate payment of the purchase money, if he be right, or something in the nature of an occupation rent, if he be wrong.

The order of June 21, 1949, is, except in one respect, in a form well known in this Division to every practitioner under the name of a "Greenwood and Turner" order, but, though such orders have been made by Chancery judges for close on one hundred and fifty years, it would appear that the present point has not hitherto been decided, or, at least, that no decision on the point has been reported. I must, therefore, look into the history of the matter to see if any light be thrown on it by the decisions. These seem to begin early in the nineteenth century, the earliest which I have found being a decision in 1808 of LORD ELDON, L.C., in Clarke v. Wilson (1). There the defendant was in possession and was objecting to the plaintiff's title, and the Lord Chancellor, on the plaintiff's motion, opined that he thought the plaintiff might require the defendant to pay the purchase money or give up possession of the estate. This practice appears to have become fixed within the next ten years and there are a number of reports on the subject, for instance, Gibson v. Clarke (2), where the side-note states that a purchaser cannot without express contract retain the possession while withholding the money. LORD ELDON, L.C., described the motion as of very great importance as a general precedent. Other cases about the same time are Burroughs v. Oakley (3), Dixon v. Astley (4), and Cutler v. Simons (5) where the side-note (2 Mer. 107) states that the orders made

"... appear to have settled the practice, partially adopted in some former cases, such as Burroughs v. Oakley (3), and Dixon v. Astley (4), as to payment into court of their purchase money, by purchasers in possession, by virtue of the agreement, and otherwise."

In Bradshaw v. Bradshaw (6), LORD ELDON, L.C., states the principle to be (2 Mer. 493): "you cannot keep the estate and money too," and a similar case is Crutchley v. Jerningham (7). To the same effect I find SIR JOHN LEACH, V.-C., in Wickham v. Evered (8), saying (4 Madd. 53):

"The defendant cannot keep possession of the estate and of his purchase-money too. If he elects to retain the possession, let the purchase-money be paid in within a month, without prejudice to any question in the cause."

COTTON, L.J., in Lewis v. James (9), refers to this type of order in these words (32 Ch.D. 330):

"This is in some respects like a case where a purchaser being in possession is required to pay into court, if he remain in possession, the purchase-money agreed upon, but it is well known that in such a case under ordinary circumstances an option is given to the purchaser to go out, and the order only is that if he continue in possession he must pay the price into court."

That is reported in 1886.

The modern form of order appears to have been settled in Greenwood v. Turner (10), where KEKEWICH, J., cited some of the cases. In that case an application was made by the plaintiff for interest on the purchase money and the judge is reported as directing the purchase money to be lodged in court with interest, or, alternatively, that the defendant do give up possession, and that, in that event, he pay to the plaintiff interest on the purchase money till the day he goes out of possession. When, however, one looks at the order made as set out in SEATON'S JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS, 7th ed., p. 2222, it was that, in the event of the defendant electing to vacate, interest should be paid, not to the vendor, but into court, and that form of order has been followed ever since, generally speaking, though ASTBURY, J., voiced his dislike of the last part of it in Re Cassano & Mackay's Contract (11). It is to be observed that the order in the present case makes no provision for interest if the purchaser deliver up possession as she was bound to do on July 5, 1949, in default of payment of the purchase money and interest into court on that day.

The cases, as it seems to me, throw no direct light on the subject. It is true that the principle under which these orders are made is that it is unjust for the purchaser to have both the property and the purchase money, and it is argued from this that what is paid is, in fact, the unpaid balance of the purchase money, and that lodgment of this sum discharges the payer from all liability in that respect so that there is no balance of the purchase money on which interest is leviable. It is said that there is no hardship on the vendor who chose to take this course knowing that the money would only earn the court rate of interest henceforward. Further, that it would be an injustice if the purchaser, being out of her purchase money, must still pay interest on it. A

I find these arguments persuasive but not decisive. It seems to me that there is nothing in that which has happened to vary the contract which provides for interest at five per cent. on the purchase money until actual completion, an event which has not yet occurred. It is true that the money lodged in court was calculated by reference to, and is in the order described as, the balance of the purchase money, and it has been so described ever since these orders were made, but it appears to me that, in fact, the contractual amount of the purchase money and interest up to the date of lodgment is merely the measure by which the court judges the just obligation of a purchaser who wishes to retain possession pending settlement of his dispute. It is, in fact, I think, no more than a security to the vendor who is deprived of his contractual option to take the rents and profits of the property in lieu of interest. Counsel for the vendor drew my attention to Humphries v. Horne (12), which seems to me pertinent in this respect. In that case, the side-note reads (3 Hare 276): B C

"A purchaser, complaining that his conveyance did not comprise the whole of the property which he had contracted for, filed his bill for a conveyance of the remainder and obtained an injunction restraining the vendor from suing him for the purchase-money, part of which was afterwards ordered to be paid into court to abide the event of the suit. The bill was dismissed. Held, that the vendor was entitled to the residue of the purchase-money and the interest upon it, to the time of payment, although the purchase-money in court had not been laid out, and no interest therefore had accrued thereon." D E

In that case the defendant had obtained judgment for the purchase money. The plaintiff obtained an injunction, as was then usual in Chancery, for restraining proceedings on that judgment, but, having filed his bill, the defendant moved for a release from the injunction and the injunction was continued only on terms, namely, that the plaintiff remaining in possession, as he did, should pay £1,000 of the purchase money to the vendor and the balance he should lodge in court, pending the dispute. The plaintiff failed in his bill, which was a bill to have a conveyance of a larger plot of land than the vendor was willing to sell to him, and SIR JAMES WIGRAM, V.-C., having decided that matter, went on in these terms (ibid., 279): F

"The question is what I ought to require the plaintiff to do. If the money were not in court the right of the vendor to interest would be determined by the contract for sale and purchase. Then what has taken place? The court, at the instance of the plaintiff, admitting that he had no defence at law in order that he might assert a right in this court which has turned out to be unfounded, has restrained the defendant from recovering his purchase-money. Common justice, and the principles of this court in accordance with it, require that the court should indemnify the defendant against the consequences of the act of the court done at the plaintiff's instance. In such a case, unless the defendant by some act or omission has prejudiced his right, he must be placed in the same situation as if the injunction had never been granted." G H out of possession, that is to say, in such a case the order could have been executed, probably, but the court says that, if the purchaser wants to have possession and yet maintain his dispute, he may be asked to lodge the purchase money in court as a security. It seems to me that the position is much the same here. There is one further point. It would be strange that a purchaser, admittedly in possession and in default, could stop interest running in this way, having regard to the proviso already alluded to in the National Conditions which only allows the avoidance of payment of interest to a purchaser who is neither in possession nor in default.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the lodgment in court of the purchase money has not deprived the vendor of his right to interest on £20,532 10s. 0d. at the contractual rate of five per cent. per annum from June 10, 1949, the date up to which interest at that rate has been added in the calculation of the money lodged in court. The vendor will give credit for interest included in the sum lodged at four per cent. from June 10, 1949, to July 5, 1949, and thereafter, if the whole sum in court be paid out to him, he will also give credit for any interest received from the Paymaster-General on the deposited sum and there will be a set off. If desired, there can be included in the order I make to-day an order directing the fund in court to be dealt with in accordance with a payment schedule which will provide for its payment out to the vendor. I gather that all apportionments have been made or agreed and that nothing stands in the way of actual completion but the dispute which I thus decide.

Action dismissed with costs. On the counterclaim, His Lordship ordered an account of the sums remaining due for unpaid purchase money and interest, and declared the vendor entitled to the excess of the sum found due over the moneys lodged in court and interest accrued on them. The purchaser was ordered to pay the costs of the counterclaim.

Applied. DU JARDIN v. BEADMAN & YOUNG, LTD. (LITTLE, third party ; BROS., LTD. [1952] 2 All E.R. 160. MARSHALL, fourth party).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.Js., and Vaisey, J.), October 17, 18, November 1, 1950.]

Factor—Mercantile agent—Possession of goods—Motor car—Consent given by owner to possession of car—Registration book obtained by a trick—Sale of car with registration book—Title of innocent purchaser—Factors Act, 1889 (c. 45), s. 2 (1).

The plaintiff gave possession of his motor car to H., a motor car dealer and a mercantile agent within the Factors Act, 1889, s. 2 (1), for the purpose of inviting offers to purchase it. By means of a trick H. induced the plaintiff to hand him the registration book relating to the car. Later the same day H., acting without the authority or knowledge of the plaintiff, sold the car and handed the registration book to the fourth party who acted in good faith without notice of any absence of authority. The fourth party subsequently sold the car to the third party, and the third party sold it to the defendants. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants claiming damages for the conversion of the car,

HELD: though the plaintiff consented to H.'s having possession of the car as a mercantile agent, within the meaning of s. 2 (1), he did not consent to his possession in that capacity of the registration book; the sale of a car without the registration book relating to it was not a sale of goods "in the ordinary course of business" within s. 2 (1), and the consent necessary to pass a good title to a purchaser under s. 2 (1) was a consent to possession of both the car and the registration book; and, therefore, H. was unable to pass a good title to the fourth party.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of DEVLIN, J., given on Apr. 3, 1950, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for conversion of a motor car. On Mar. 15, 1949, the plaintiff saw a Mr. Hunt, the managing director of a company called the Reliance Motor Haulage Contractors, Ltd., who told the plaintiff that he (Hunt) could get him a new motor car in six months for £467, but would require a deposit of £100. On Mar. 18 the plaintiff, having thought over the offer, drove the car which he then owned to Hunt's showroom. After some discussion whether the car could be sold in view of the covenant limiting his right to re-sell into which the plaintiff had entered with the vendors of the car, the plaintiff produced the registration book from his pocket to clear up this point and also to show other particulars regarding the car. While he was holding the registration book in his hand Hunt received a message, and, on his return ten minutes later, he asked the plaintiff to accompany Mrs. Hunt, whom the plaintiff knew, to a hospital. The plaintiff consented, and he was away some time and forgot about the registration book which he had left with Hunt. Later the same day Hunt sold the plaintiff's car to the fourth party to whom he handed the registration book. Later, Hunt was prosecuted and convicted of fraud in connection with this sale and other dealings with cars. DEVLIN, J., found that the plaintiff left the car with Hunt to see what offers for it were made on the basis that when the new car was available the old one would be sold through Hunt. He also found that Hunt tricked the plaintiff out of the possession of the registration book by the incident with Mrs. Hunt because he wanted to sell the car and misappropriate the money.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 1. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of DEVLIN, J., who decided against the plaintiff. There is a third and a fourth party. The claim is for damages for the conversion of a motor car, which admittedly up to Mar. 17, 1949, was the property of the plaintiff. The car came into the possession of a Mr. Hunt, admittedly a mercantile agent. The fourth party bought it from Mr. Hunt and claims a good title under s. 2 (1) of the Factors Act, 1889, which is as follows:

A (1) Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition
B notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same."

The fourth party sold the car to the third party, who sold it to the defendants. The sole issue in the appeal is whether the fourth party did or did not get a good title under the Factors Act, 1889.

[HIS LORDSHIP set out the facts and said he agreed with the finding by
C DEVLIN, J., that the car was not left with Mr. Hunt wholly or mainly for repair, and continued:] On these findings counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the only possible conclusion was that the car was obtained by larceny by a trick. On that basis there are conflicting opinions whether s. 2 (1) of the Factors Act, 1889, can or cannot apply. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted it could not.
D I will refer to this later because I have come to the conclusion that the appeal succeeds on the judge's findings irrespective of that point. It is, I think, clear that on the sale of a second-hand car the vendor will ordinarily deliver and the purchaser require the delivery of the registration, or "log", book. Counsel for the plaintiff stated, and I accept it, that he did not contend that cars could not be sold without their log books, but the price would be substantially reduced thereby. This shows, and I so hold, that a sale of a car without its log book
E would not be a sale "in the ordinary course of business." The findings of DEVLIN, J., as to Mr. Hunt's reasons for getting hold of the log book support this view.

✓ The transaction which the fourth party seeks to uphold is the sale of a car with its log book, a more valuable subject-matter than a car without its log book. Mr. Hunt, it seems to me, was never in possession of the log book with
F the consent of the plaintiff. One can test it in this way. If immediately after the plaintiff had left the building he had been asked: "Did you mean to leave your car?" he would have answered "Yes." If he had been asked: "Did you mean to leave your log book?" he would have answered "No," and would have gone back and collected it. The ostensible authority which enabled Mr. Hunt to effect a sale "in the ordinary course of business" arose because of
G his possession of the log book without the consent of the owner. The relationship of the log book, which is, of course, not a document of title, to a motor car is one to which no useful analogy has occurred to me. I am, however, of opinion that on the conclusions as set out above the fourth party cannot claim the protection of the Factors Act, 1889. In cases of larceny by a trick, the person
H defrauded does in one sense consent to the possession of the thief, but, so far as the log book is concerned, for the reasons I have given, the plaintiff never consented to Mr. Hunt's having possession of it.

The issue with regard to larceny by a trick was fully argued before us. I will deal with it because, if there was larceny by a trick of the goods sold, and this prevents the Factors Act applying, the appeal would succeed in any event. I accept the submission of counsel for the plaintiff that, on the findings of DEVLIN, J., there is only one possible conclusion—that the possession of the car was obtained by larceny by a trick. The law as to larceny by a trick is fully set out in the judgment of BANKES, L.J., in Folkes v. King (2) ([1923] 1 K.B. 291 to 293). It seems to me clear that Mr. Hunt had an animus furandi at the time he got possession of the car and that the other conditions are fulfilled. The plaintiff clearly did not intend to pass the property, nor on the judge's findings did he authorise Mr. Hunt to conclude a sale.

The question whether this necessarily excludes a purchaser from the protection of the Factors Act has been considered in more than one case, but there is no clear decision on the point. In Folkes v. King (2) BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., considered the point. BANKES, L.J., said ([1923] 1 K.B. 296):

"The question is whether, assuming that Hudson was guilty of larceny of the car, that fact renders it impossible that anyone can have obtained a title to the car from Hudson under the Factors Act; the argument being that no one can under those circumstances prove the owner's consent to the car being in Hudson's possession. The argument against this view was admirably put by Mr. J. A. Hamilton (as he then was) in Oppenheimer v. Frazer & Wyatt (3), but it was expressly rejected by every member of the court. The view taken by the court in that case as to the want of bona fides on the part of the purchaser of the goods rendered it unnecessary to decide the point, and the opinions of the members of the court are therefore, I think, strictly speaking obiter and not binding upon us. They deserve however to be treated with the greatest respect, and it is only because I am unable after full consideration to agree with them that I venture to differ from the conclusion at which they arrived."

In Oppenheimer v. Frazer & Wyatt (3), FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said ([1907] 2 K.B. 71):

"A mercantile agent is as capable of stealing as any other man, and, if he has stolen the goods, there can be no question, in my opinion, that he must be taken to hold possession of them without the consent of the owner. One of the recognised methods of stealing at common law is distinguished from other types of larceny, and called larceny by a trick, but it is in the eye of the law pure stealing."

With regard to the consent required for the Factors Acts, BANKES, L.J., in Folkes v. King (2) said ([1923] 1 K.B. 297):

"What the section refers to is the consent of the owner. To establish a consent it is no doubt necessary to consider what the state of mind of the owner of the goods was with reference to the possession of them by the mercantile agent."

SCRUTTON, L.J., after referring to the earlier cases, said (ibid., 305):

"First on the question whether to prove larceny by a trick is a defence to the Factors Act as excluding consent of the true owner. I can understand that where by a trick there is error in the person there is no true consent and the Factors Act is excluded. But where there is agreement on the person and the true owner intends to give him possession, it does not seem to me that the fact that the person apparently agreeing to accept an agency really means to disregard the agency, and act for his own benefit, destroys the consent of the true owner under the Factors Act. That Act intended to protect a purchaser in good faith carrying out an ordinary mercantile transaction with a person in the position of a mercantile agent. It does not do so completely, for it requires the purchaser to prove that the goods were in possession of the mercantile agent 'with the consent of the owner.' But it does not require the purchaser in addition to prove that the mercantile agent agreed both openly and secretly, ostensibly and really, to the terms on which the owner transferred possession to the mercantile agent. It appears to me to be enough to show that the true owner did intentionally deposit in the hands of the mercantile agent the goods in question. It is admitted that if he was induced to deposit the goods by a fraudulent misrepresentation as to external facts, he has yet consented to give possession, and the Factors Act applies, but it is argued that if he deposits the goods in the possession of an agent who secretly intends to break his contract of agency the Factors Act does not apply.

A I do not think Parliament had any intention of applying the artificial distinctions of the criminal law to a commercial transaction, defeating it if there were larceny by a trick, but not if there were only larceny by a bailee, or possession obtained by false pretences."

I have set out these passages at some length because I agree with the conclusion and the reasons given for it and do not desire to add to them. ATKIN, L.J., in Lake v. Simmons (4), in a dissenting judgment ([1926] 2 K.B. 72) expressed his preference for the opinions expressed in Oppenheimer v. Frazer & Wyatt (3) as against those expressed by BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., in Folkes v. King (2). The Court of Appeal were reversed in the House of Lords on a different point. VISCOUNT SUMNER referred to and set out the two divergent views without expressing an opinion ([1927] A.C. 509, 510). As the issue was

B fully argued before us, and as opinions have already been expressed, I thought it right to set out the conclusion to which I have come. For the reasons given above I think the appeal succeeds.

DENNING, L.J.: In the early days of the common law the governing principle of our law of property was that no person could give a better title than he himself had got, but the needs of commerce have led to a progressive

D modification of this principle so as to protect innocent purchasers. We have had cases in this court recently about sales in market overt and sales by a sheriff, and now we have the present case about sales by a mercantile agent. The cases show how difficult it is to strike the right balance between the claims of true owners and the claims of innocent purchasers. The way that Parliament has done it in the case of mercantile agents is this. Parliament has protected

E the true owner by making it clear that he does not lose his right to goods when they are taken from him without his consent, as, for instance, when they have been stolen from his house by a burglar who has handed them over to a mercantile agent. In that case the true owner can claim them back from any person into whose hands they come, even from an innocent purchaser who has bought from a mercantile agent. Parliament has not protected the true owner if he

F has himself consented to a mercantile agent having possession of them, because, by leaving them in the agent's possession, he has clothed the agent with apparent authority to sell them, and he should not, therefore, be allowed to claim them back from an innocent purchaser.

The critical question, therefore, in every case is whether the true owner consented to the mercantile agent having possession of the goods. This is

G often a very difficult question to decide. There are three points of principle which arise for consideration in the present case.

(i) If the goods are stolen from the true owner by the mercantile agent, does that mean that the owner does not consent to the mercantile agent having possession of them? At first sight the answer seems to be obvious. No man ever consents to the theft of his goods, but therein lurks a fallacy. There are

H many cases of larceny where the true owner consents to the thief having possession of the goods, but not to his stealing them. For instance, if the true owner allows the agent to have the goods on hire or for repair, and the agent later on makes up his mind to steal them and does so, either by breaking bulk (common law), or by converting them to his own use (statute), the agent is guilty of larceny as a bailee, but the true owner undoubtedly consented to his having possession of them. Take the same instance where the owner lets the agent have the goods on hire or for repair, but, with this difference, that the agent from the very beginning intended to steal the goods, then on all the authorities the agent is guilty of larceny by a trick, but the owner undoubtedly consented to his having possession of them. His state of mind is the same in both instances. He consented to possession, but not to the theft of the goods. In my opinion, therefore, the fact that the agent is guilty of larceny by a trick does not prevent the operation of the Factors Act any more than the fact that he has been guilty of larceny as a bailee. I find myself in full agreement with the judgments of BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., in Folkes v. King (2), and I see nothing to the contrary in the opinion of VISCOUNT SUMNER in Lake v. Simmons (4) ([1927] A.C. 510, 511).

(ii) If the true owner was induced to part with the goods by some fraud on the part of the mercantile agent, does that mean that he did not consent to the mercantile agent having possession of them? Again the answer at first sight seems obvious. A consent obtained by fraud is no consent at all, because fraud negatives consent. The effect of fraud, however, in this, as in other parts of the law, is as a rule only to make the transaction voidable and not void, and if, therefore, an innocent purchaser has bought the goods before the transaction is avoided the true owner cannot claim them back. For instance, if a mercantile agent should induce the owner to pass the property to him by some false pretence, as by giving him a worthless cheque, or should induce the owner to entrust the property to him for display purposes, by falsely pretending that he was in a large way of business when he was not, then the owner cannot claim the goods back from an innocent purchaser who has bought them in good faith from the mercantile agent. The agent's offence may in some cases be obtaining goods by false pretences, or in other cases larceny by a trick, the difference depending on whether as a result of the fraud the owner intended to pass to the agent the property or the power to pass the property (false pretences), or only to pass the possession (larceny by trick). In each case, whether the owner intended to pass the property or not, at any rate he consented to the agent having possession. The consent may have been obtained by fraud but, until avoided, it is a consent which enables the Factors Act to operate; see per SCRUTTON, L.J., in Folkes v. King (2) ([1923] 1 K.B. 301, 302).

(iii) If the true owner consents to the mercantile agent having the goods for repair but not for sale, is that a consent which enables the Factors Act to operate? The answer would seem at first sight to be "Yes," because it is undoubtedly a consent to the agent having possession, but this needs testing. Suppose, for instance, that the owner of furniture leaves it with a repairer for repair and that the repairer happens to be a dealer as well. Does that mean that the repairer can deprive the true owner of his goods by selling them to a buyer? Clearly not, if the owner did not know the repairer to be a dealer, and, even if he did, why should that incidental knowledge deprive the true owner of his goods? Such considerations have led the courts to the conclusion that the consent, which is to enable the Factors Act to operate, must be a consent to the possession of the goods by a mercantile agent as mercantile agent; see per CHANNELL, J., in Oppenheimer v. Frazer & Wyatt (3) ([1907] 1 K.B. 527) and per MACKINNON, J., in Staffs Motor Guarantee, Ltd. v. British Wagon Co., Ltd. (5) ([1934] 2 K.B. 313). That means that the owner must consent to the agent having them for a purpose which is in some way or other connected with his business as a mercantile agent. It may not actually be for sale. It may be for display or to get offers, or merely to put the goods in his showroom, but there must be a consent to something of that kind before the owner can be deprived of his goods.

If it were right to apply these considerations to the car taken by itself, without the registration book, I should find myself in full agreement with the judgment of DEVLIN, J. Hunt was a mercantile agent who got possession of the car with the consent of the plaintiff. It is true that Hunt was probably guilty of larceny by a trick. The plaintiff did not intend to pass the property to him or even to give him the power to pass the property, and Hunt had the animus furandi from the beginning. That does not alter the fact that the plaintiff consented to his having possession of it. It is also true that he intended Hunt to repair it, but the plaintiff also intended that Hunt should act in some respects as a dealer by receiving offers from prospective purchasers. He did, therefore, consent to his having possession of the car as a mercantile agent.

A Where I do not agree with DEVLIN, J., is that he put the registration book on one side as if it was of no significance in law. He seems to have thought the Factors Act operated if the mercantile agent had possession of the car with the consent of the true owner, even though he did not have possession of the registration book. I cannot share that view. This court has recently had to consider the position of the registration book, or, as it is more commonly called,

B the "log book", of a car: see Bishopsgate Motor Finance Corp'n., Ltd. v. Transport Brakes, Ltd. (6) ([1949] 1 All E.R. 46). It is not a document of title, but it is the best evidence of title. Everyone who buys or sells a second-hand car knows that a clean title cannot be given or obtained without the log book. The instructions on every log book tell the owner to "keep this book in a safe place, not on the vehicle" and that "on transferring the vehicle to another person you must hand over this book to the person acquiring the vehicle."

C All sensible owners pay heed to these instructions. If the seller can produce the book showing that his title is in order, he will receive the proper market price, but no wise buyer pays his money except against delivery, not only of the car, but also of the log book. If the seller cannot produce it, he will receive as a rule only a fraction of the proper price, because its absence is of itself notice of a defect of title. This state of affairs was foreseen by SCRUTTON, L.J., twenty-seven years ago. In Folkes v. King (2) he said ([1923] 1 K.B. 300):

D "If the production of the book, or if it was said to be lost, of a new one, was required by every purchaser, it would be very difficult to find a market for the cars which have lately been stolen in such large numbers; and the courts may have to take adverse notice of the conduct of a purchaser who does not require the production of the book of registry."

E The courts have adopted that suggestion, and now view with suspicion any dealing in a second-hand car without a log book.

F When the significance of the log book is realised, it becomes plain that the consent of the owner, which is necessary for the Factors Act to operate, is a consent to the possession by the mercantile agent, not only of the car, but also of the log book that goes with it. So long as the owner retains the log book, the mercantile agent cannot dispose of the car in the ordinary course of his business, because it is not in the ordinary course of anyone's business to dispose of a second-hand car without a log book. The retention by the owner of the log book, therefore, effectually prevents the Factors Act from operating.

G The handing over of the log book with the car enables the Act to operate. The owner then clothes the agent with apparent authority to dispose of the car, and the agent is enabled to dispose of it in the ordinary course of his business, and the Factors Act operates to give a good title to an innocent purchaser. To put it shortly, in the case of a car, "goods" in the Act means the car together with the log book.

H This brings me to the critical question in this case: Did the plaintiff consent to Hunt having possession of the log book as well as the car? On the findings of fact by DEVLIN, J., the answer is clearly "No." On Mar. 18, 1949, the plaintiff simply let Hunt have the log book in his hands to inspect it for a few moments. The plaintiff gave Hunt the barest physical custody of it while he was still there himself. He never consented to Hunt having possession of it. Then Hunt, by a trick, managed to get the plaintiff called away while he, Hunt, still held the book. Armed thus with the log book, Hunt was able to sell the car on the very same day to an innocent purchaser, which, without it, he could not have done. On those facts the plaintiff no more consented to Hunt having possession of the log book than if Hunt had stolen it from his pocket. The Factors Act does not operate, therefore, to give a good title to the dealer who bought from Hunt, nor to the buyers in succession from him.

I confess that I come to this conclusion with some reluctance, because I recognise that the legislature intended the courts to make every reasonable presumption in favour of the innocent purchaser: see s. 2 (4) of the Act, but my reluctance is tempered by the reflection that in this case the buyer, Mr. Marshall, was himself a motor car dealer, who bought the car from Hunt on Mar. 18, 1949, for £450 and sold it on Mar. 21, 1949, for £620. A dealer whose business enables him to make quick and large profits of that kind must not be surprised if he occasionally gets his fingers burnt. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed.

VAISEY, J.: Where there are two innocent parties of whom one has to suffer for the criminal act of a third, no decision can be said to be satisfactory. This example of that familiar problem presents to my mind considerable difficulty. On the whole, having had the advantage of reading the judgments of my Lords which have just been delivered, I share their view that this appeal should succeed. What the relationship between a motor car and its registration book or log book really is, I find it extremely difficult to define. For many purposes the book ought not to be regarded as a part of the car in the same sense as one of the car's four wheels can be so regarded. What strikes me as decisive of the present case is the fact, already pointed out by my Lords, that a dealer in cars, being a mercantile agent, cannot be said to be "acting in the ordinary course of" his business as such when selling a car without its log book, any more, in my judgment, than he would be so acting if he sold a car with only three wheels. Suppose that a car with only three of its wheels had come into the dealer's possession with the owner's consent, and that the dealer had proceeded to steal the fourth wheel from the owner's garage, had placed it on the car, and had then sold the car. In such a case, I do not think that the totality of the four-wheeled vehicle could be said to have come into the dealer's possession with the owner's consent, so as to bring into operation s. 2 (1) of the Factors Act, 1889. When once it is admitted that the sale of a car without a log book is not an ordinary, but a quite extraordinary, transaction on the part of a dealer in cars, I think it must follow that the transaction here is not within the protection of the sub-section. In suggesting the imaginary case of the stolen wheel, I am well aware of the danger of analogies, and mine may be no better than most. The Act does modify and form an exception to the general law of property by conferring a title upon strangers in derogation of the rights of the true owner, and for myself I would be reluctant to extend its operation further than its terms necessitate. The appeal appears to me to be well-founded, and I have nothing further to add.

Appeal allowed with costs.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pilcher, J.), October 16, 17, 30, 1950.]

Divorce—Domicil—Petition by wife—Extent of onus on wife to prove husband's domicil in England—Husband domiciled in Canada at date of presentation of petition—Wife resident in England for thirty-one months, and in Canada for five months, of three years immediately preceding commencement of proceedings—"Ordinarily resident"—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (c. 100), s. 1 (1) (a).

- A The parties were married in England in September, 1943. The husband was born and educated in Eire, but his father's domicil was English. In May, 1939 (when he was between eighteen and nineteen years of age), the husband came to England and obtained a commission in the Fleet Air Arm. After returning from active service in 1945, he lived in England until 1949, when he visited Canada with the object of obtaining employment there. The wife lived in England until Apr. 15, 1949, when, the husband having returned to England in March, she accompanied him to Canada. While she was in Canada, the parties had no home of their own in England, but on obtaining employment in Canada, the husband contemplated settling there. On Sept. 22 the wife returned to England, and on Oct. 11 she filed a petition for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty, alleging that he was domiciled in England. The husband contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit as he had acquired a domicil in Canada at the time of the presentation of the petition. The wife contended inter alia that, even if he had acquired a Canadian domicil at the time of the presentation of the petition, the court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) (a), as she was resident in England and had been "ordinarily resident there for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings," within the meaning of the section.

HELD: (i) where a wife, in her petition for divorce, alleged that the husband was domiciled in England, the onus was on her to make out a prima facie case in support of the allegation, but if, through no fault of hers, the evidence was scanty, she had discharged her burden, provided that the facts proved tended rather to show that the court had jurisdiction than that it had not.

- F (ii) on the true construction of the words "ordinarily resident" in s. 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1949, the qualifying adverb "ordinarily" added nothing to the adjective "resident"; during the five months that the wife was resident in Canada she was "ordinarily resident" there within the meaning of the section; and, therefore, she was not "ordinarily resident" in England during the three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings, and the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit under s. 1 (1) (a).

PETITION by the wife for divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty and constructive desertion. The husband, by his answer, alleged that at the time of the presentation of the petition he was domiciled in Canada, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. By an amendment to her petition the wife alleged (inter alia) that, even if the husband had acquired a Canadian domicile at the time of the presentation of the petition, the court had jurisdiction to entertain the suit under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) (a), as she had been ordinarily resident in England for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings. A

The husband's father was born in England in 1883, but lived in Eire and carried on a business there from before the birth of the husband, in 1920, until 1942, when the father retired from business, returned to England, bought a house in Sussex, and made a home there with his wife. The husband was born and brought up in Eire. In 1939 he came to England and obtained a commission in the Fleet Air Arm. He had an English passport, and regarded himself as English. In September, 1943, the parties were married. A week after the marriage, the husband went abroad on active service and returned to England in 1945. He remained in England until Feb. 2, 1949, when he flew to Canada with the object of trying to obtain employment there. He returned to England at the end of March, and on Apr. 15 he and the wife went to Canada together. In May he obtained employment in Canada, and on Sept. 1 the parties moved into a bungalow which they had taken on a yearly tenancy. On Sept. 20, 1949, the wife left Canada, arriving in England on Sept. 22, and on Oct. 11 she filed her petition for divorce. B C D

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 30. PILCHER, J., read the following judgment. The petitioner, Mrs. Barbara Henden Hopkins, asks for the dissolution of her marriage with her husband, Mr. Richard Donald Buchanan Hopkins, on the ground of his alleged cruelty and constructive desertion. By his answer the husband alleges that at the time of the presentation of the petition he was domiciled out of the jurisdiction of this court, namely, in the province of Ontario, in the dominion of Canada. He also denies that he was guilty of the alleged cruelty or desertion. The parties were married on Sept. 11, 1943, and there are two children of the marriage, both girls, aged respectively six and four years. The husband did not attend the trial, and the wife's evidence, given in support of her allegations of cruelty and desertion, consequently stands unchallenged. At the trial the wife was cross-examined solely as to the issue of domicile. By an amendment to her petition, the wife alleged that, even if at the time of the presentation of the petition her husband had acquired a Canadian domicile, this court was none the less entitled to entertain her suit under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 13, because on a proper view of the facts and the law her husband deserted her immediately before he left this country for Canada on Feb. 2, 1949, and at a time when he still had an English domicile. In the further alternative, she alleged that the court had jurisdiction to entertain her suit under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) (a), because she had been ordinarily resident in England for a period of upwards of three years immediately preceding the presentation of her petition on Oct. 11, 1949. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, found that the husband was guilty of cruelty, and continued:] The question whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain the wife's suit raises a number of points which are not easy to resolve, largely because of the very meagre evidence available for their determination. The matters to be decided can be stated shortly: (i) Was the husband's domicile of origin English or Irish? (ii) Did he before the presentation of the petition E F G H lose his domicile of origin and acquire a domicile of choice in Canada? (iii) If the husband had at the material date a Canadian domicile of choice, (a) is it established that the wife was "ordinarily resident" in England for the three years preceding the commencement of these proceedings, and (b) if so, do the provisions of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1), apply retrospectively so as to confer on the court the extended jurisdiction provided for in the section where the suit is instituted before the passing of the Act? (iv) If the husband had an English domicile when he first left for Canada on Feb. 2, 1949, but had lost it and acquired a Canadian domicile when the suit was instituted, was he, on Feb. 2, 1949, guilty of desertion or constructive desertion so as to enable the wife to rely on the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 13?

I will deal with these points in order. The material facts which bear on the question of the husband's domicile of origin are few and can be stated shortly. His father was born in 1883 in Somerset and lived in Ireland at least from the husband's birth in 1920 until he returned to England in 1942 and thereafter settled in Sussex. While in Ireland, the husband's father carried on a seedsman's business which his father had carried on before him. How often, and for what periods, the husband's father during his sojourn in Ireland was in the habit of visiting England or any other country, we do not know. In her petition the wife alleges, as she is bound to do, that the husband was domiciled in England, and, no doubt, as a technical matter the onus of substantiating this allegation rests in the first place on her. Having heard such evidence as she was able to give, I have only the scantiest information on which to arrive at any conclusion as to the husband's domicile of origin. In my view, in a case of this character, all that the wife has to do is to make out a prima facie case. If through no fault of the wife's the available evidence is scanty, the wife has discharged her burden, provided that the facts proved tend rather to show that the court has jurisdiction than that it has not. After a careful consideration not only of those facts which are proved, but of those which are not, and basing myself principally on the fact that the husband's father was born in this country, and that he returned to this country when his business life was over, I find that his domicile of origin was English, and that he never lost his English domicile. From this it follows that the husband's domicile of origin was English. He necessarily retained this English domicile of origin until he came of age, by which time he had been serving at least two years in the Fleet Air Arm.

[On the second point for consideration, HIS LORDSHIP, after reviewing the evidence, found that the husband had discharged the onus which was on him of proving that he had abandoned his domicile of origin and acquired a new domicile of choice in Canada before the wife presented her petition on Oct. 11, 1949.]

Finding, as I do, that at the material time the husband had acquired a domicile of choice in Canada, I now have to consider whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain the wife's suit under s. 1 (1) (a) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949. The material words of the sub-section are as follows:

"The High Court in England shall have jurisdiction in proceedings by a wife for divorce, notwithstanding that the husband is not domiciled in England, if (a) the wife is resident in England and has been ordinarily resident there for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings."

The wife was clearly resident in England when she commenced these proceedings and the facts with regard to her residence during the three preceding years are not in doubt. Apart from a fortnight's holiday in Jersey in May, 1948, and one very short visit to the continent, the wife's residence during the material period, and, so far as I know, throughout her life, has been in England, except when she went to Canada with her husband. She arrived in Canada on Apr. 15, 1949, and left Canada on Sept. 20, 1949. It would, I think, be impossible to say that during these five months she was resident anywhere other than in Canada. During this period she was living in Canada with her husband, and neither she nor her husband had any home of their own in England. It follows that for thirty-one months out of the material thirty-six months immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings the wife was resident in England, and for the remaining five months she was resident in Canada. If this be so, it is clear that the wife cannot say that she was resident in England for the necessary three years preceding the commencement of the proceedings. Can she contend successfully, that, although in fact resident in Canada for five months out of the material thirty-six, she was none the less "ordinarily resident" throughout the whole period in England. This is not a case in which it can be, or is, contended that the wife had at the same time two physical residences, in either of which it was open to her to reside at will. In fact, on my findings she was, after her husband's determination to settle in Canada crystallised, not only resident but in law domiciled in Canada. On this state of facts, giving to the words "ordinarily resident . . . for a period of three years immediately preceding the commencement of the proceedings" what I conceive to be their ordinary and natural meaning, I should have found it difficult to hold that the petitioner had brought herself within the words of the section. A B C

The matter does not, however, rest there. The meaning of the words "residence" and "ordinarily resident" have frequently had to be considered in tax cases—the period in those cases during which the "residence" or "ordinary residence" was in question being, as a rule, the fiscal year. In Levene v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., said ([1928] A.C. 225): D

"It remains to be considered whether during the period in question the appellant 'ordinarily resided' in the United Kingdom for the purposes of s. 46 of [the Income Tax Act, 1918], and I think that there was material upon which the commissioners could answer this question in the affirmative. The suggestion that in order to determine whether a man ordinarily resides in this country you must count the days which he spends here and those which he spends elsewhere, and that it is only if in any year the former are more numerous than the latter that he can be held to be ordinarily resident here, appears to me to be without substance. The expression 'ordinary residence' is found in the Income Tax Act of 1806 and occurs again and again in the later Income Tax Acts, where it is contrasted with usual or occasional or temporary residence; and I think that it connotes residence in a place with some degree of continuity and apart from accidental or temporary absences. So understood the expression differs little in meaning from the word 'residence' as used in the Acts; and I find it difficult to imagine a case in which a man while not resident here is yet ordinarily resident here." E F G

In the same case LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE said (ibid., 232):

"I do not attempt to give any definition of the word 'resident.' In my opinion it has no technical or special meaning for the purposes of the Income Tax Act. 'Ordinarily resident' also seems to me to have no such technical or special meaning. In particular it is in my opinion impossible to restrict its connotation to its duration. A member of this House may well be said to be ordinarily resident in London during the Parliamentary session and in the country during the recess. If it has any definite meaning I should say it means according to the way in which a man's life is usually ordered." H

In view of these passages it is not surprising that it is now well recognised in inland revenue cases that there is no ground for applying a different meaning to the words "resident" and "ordinarily resident" over a defined period where chargeability to tax is involved. While it does not necessarily follow that the same considerations apply when the words have to be considered in an Act of Parliament governing a totally different subject, I am, none the less, bound to pay, and do pay, respectful attention to the fact that VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in dealing with the meaning of words which have been the subject of frequent consideration in tax cases, concluded that the word "ordinary" lends no real added meaning to the word "residence."

In Macrae v. Macrae (2), where the question was whether a husband was ordinarily resident in Scotland so as to oust the jurisdiction of justices to entertain a summons for maintenance of his wife, SOMERVELL, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 37):

"Where there are indications that the place to which he moves is the place which he intends to make his home for, at any rate, an indefinite period, as from that date he is ordinarily resident at that place."

My own view is that, on the facts of this case, and giving to the words "ordinarily resident" their natural meaning, the wife was, while physically present in Canada, "ordinarily resident" there. She was clearly resident there, and to find that she was also, during the period of her stay, "ordinarily resident" there involves a conclusion that—on the facts of this particular case, at least—the qualifying adverb "ordinarily" adds nothing to the adjective "resident." Such a conclusion accords with the view taken by the highest tribunal in the country when called on to construe identical and similar words in the revenue Acts, and also accords with the view of the meaning of the words taken by SOMERVELL, L.J., in Macrae v. Macrae (2). It follows that, if the wife was ordinarily resident in Canada during her five months' sojourn, then she was not "ordinarily resident" in England during the three years preceding the commencement of the proceedings, and that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain her suit under the provisions of s. 1 (1) (a) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949. Having regard to my finding which I have just stated, it is unnecessary for me to deal with the submissions made on behalf of the husband that the provisions of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1949 are not retrospective and cannot be invoked by a petitioner who commences proceedings before the Act came into force.

[HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the wife's plea that the court had jurisdiction to entertain her suit under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 13, because the husband was guilty of constructive desertion immediately before he left this country for Canada on Feb. 2, 1949, and while he still had an English domicile. HIS LORDSHIP held that the evidence could not sustain the plea of constructive desertion, and, therefore, the court could not entertain the suit under s. 13 of the Act of 1937. Accordingly, he dismissed the petition.]

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 25, 1950.]

Administration—Partial intestacy—Hotchpot—“Any beneficial interest acquired by any issue of the deceased”—Share of residue settled, subject to widow's life interest therein, on discretionary trusts for benefit of testator's son, C., or C.'s children during C.'s lifetime, and for C.'s children absolutely after his death—C. surviving testator, but predeceasing widow—Distribution of residue as to which partial intestacy—Need of C.'s personal representative to bring into account share settled by will—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 49 (a). A

By his will, dated Feb. 25, 1938, the testator gave the income of his residuary estate on trust for his widow for life. On the death of the widow, five-sevenths of the residue were to be divided in equal shares between five of his children. The testator then settled a seventh share of the residue, subject to the widow's life interest therein, on discretionary trusts for the benefit of his son, C., or of C.'s children during the lifetime of C., and after C.'s death that seventh share was to be held on trust for C.'s children in equal shares. Another seventh share of the residue was settled on similar trusts for the benefit of the testator's son, H., and his children, but H. had died without issue on May 20, 1936. The testator died on Jan. 9, 1939, and C. died on Jan. 26, 1939, leaving two children who attained a vested interest in the one-seventh share settled on C. and his children. The testator's widow died in July, 1948. The question was how the seventh share of the residue, as to which, as from his widow's death, the testator had died intestate, was to be divided among the testator's next of kin. B

HELD: on the true construction of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 49 (a), the word “issue” was there used to mean “children or remoter issue,” and any beneficial interest which a child and his children together acquired under the will was a beneficial interest acquired by the “issue of the deceased” within the meaning of the section; therefore, on the distribution of one-seventh share of the residue as to which, as from the widow's death, the testator had died intestate, C.'s personal representative was liable to bring into account the capital of the one-seventh share settled by the will on C. and his children. ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine questions arising in regard to the distribution of a one-seventh share of the testator's residuary estate as to which, as from and after the death of his widow, he had died intestate. G

By his will the testator had settled another one-seventh share of his residue, subject to the widow's life interest therein, on discretionary trusts for the benefit of his son, Charles, or Charles' children during Charles' life, and to be held on trust for Charles' children after Charles' death. Charles survived the testator by less than three weeks and predeceased the widow, leaving two children who took a vested interest in the share settled on him and his children. The question was whether Charles' estate was entitled, without bringing anything into hotchpot, to a share of the one-seventh share of residue as to which, as from the widow's death, the testator had died intestate, or whether Charles' legal personal representative was liable to bring into account the capital of H the one-seventh share which had been settled on Charles and his children. The facts and the relevant provisions of the will appear in the judgment.

Winterbotham for the plaintiffs, trustees under the will.

Grove for the first defendant, legal personal representative of Charles.

Robert S. Lazarus for the second defendant, a daughter of the testator.

A Harold Lightman for the third and fourth defendants, legal personal representatives of a son of the testator.

B HARMAN, J.: The testator, George Robert Young, had seven children, of whom six survived, and one predeceased, him. Of the six who survived, three are Wilfrid George Young, Annie Amelia Moon, and Ethel Margaret Wood, who are the plaintiffs to this summons, being the present trustees of the will. The fourth was Charles Albert Young, whose widow and personal representative, is the first defendant. He died on Jan. 26, 1939, less than three weeks after the death of the testator, who died on Jan. 9, 1939. The fifth child is the defendant, Florence Mary Kay. The third and fourth defendants are the personal representatives of the sixth child, Ernest Robert Young, who survived the testator and died on Feb. 23, 1939. The seventh child, Herbert Henry Young, died sine prole on May 20, 1936, almost two years before the C testator made his will. It is a remarkable feature of the will that it makes provision for Herbert and his children, although one would have thought that it was within the testator's knowledge that he had already been dead nearly two years without leaving children.

D By his will, which was made on Feb. 25, 1938, the testator gave the income of his residuary estate on trust for his widow for life, or until her re-marriage, and, on the death of the widow on July 21, 1948, the estate became distributable. The will is plain. On the widow's death, the trust funds were to be divided "as to five-sevenths thereof" in equal shares between his children, Ernest, Wilfrid, Annie, Ethel, and Florence. There was a provision for substitution (which did not take effect) whereby the children of a child who had died during his lifetime were to take the parent's share. The trustees were E then directed to hold a further seventh share on trust, at their absolute discretion, to pay or apply the whole or part of the income or part of the capital thereof for the maintenance or support of Charles or any child or children of his during his life, or to keep up a home for him or them, or to make any other like application of such income or capital, and, if, during the life of Charles, the income of this one-seventh share was not applied by the trustees F for the benefit of Charles or his children under the discretionary power, the unapplied income was, from time to time, to be paid or applied to such other of the testator's child or children in such share or shares as the trustees should think fit. After the death of Charles, the trustees were to stand possessed

G " . . . of the said share or so much thereof as shall remain unapplied and the income thereof upon trust for the child or children of my said son and if more than one equally between them who shall attain the age of twenty-one years . . . "

Charles died leaving two children who, having attained the age of twenty-one, inherited his share on Jan. 26, 1939, subject to the life interest of the testator's widow.

H The testator then bequeathed:

" . . . the remaining one-seventh share of and in my trust funds and the investments for the time being representing the same to my trustees upon similar trusts for the benefit of my son Herbert Henry Young and his children as are hereinbefore provided and declared respecting the child or children of my said son Charles Albert Young."

As Herbert Henry had died without issue before the date of the will, the testator had failed to dispose effectively of one-seventh of his residuary estate except for the widow's life interest therein. She having died, her estate gets £1,000 and interest on that sum.

The question before me is what is to happen to the remainder of that one-seventh. Under the old law there would not have been any difficulty. It would have been divided among the next-of-kin because it was decided by numerous authorities that the Statute of Distribution, 1670, s. 3, which involved the bringing in of portions, as they were called, on an intestacy, did not apply to a partial intestacy. The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, however, seeking, no doubt, to avoid some anomalies produced by the existing law, has, so far as I can see, produced a whole new crop of anomalies.

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 47 (1) (iii), provides:

"Where the property held on the statutory trusts for issue is divisible into shares, then any money or property which, by way of advancement or on the marriage of a child of the intestate, has been paid to such child by the intestate or settled by the intestate for the benefit of such child (including any life or less interest and including property covenanted to be paid or settled) shall, subject to any contrary intention expressed or appearing from the circumstances of the case, be taken as being so paid or settled in or towards satisfaction of the share of such child or the share which such child would have taken if living at the death of the intestate, and shall be brought into account, at a valuation . . ."

That applies, as it seems to me, to money or property either advanced direct to a child or settled on him. I should have thought that, in either event, it was the capital sum so dealt with which was to be brought into account, i.e., either a sum given to a child or provided for him to set him up in life (a direct application for his benefit), or a sum provided for his marriage settlement. That is in line with the old cases, e.g., Weyland v. Weyland (1), which decided that money settled on a son by way of marriage settlement was to be brought into hotchpot before the son could be entitled to a share of the intestate's personal estate. In Re Reeve (2), CLAUSON, J., decided ([1935] 1 Ch. 119) that this was also the case under s. 47 (1) (iii) of the Act of 1925.

So far, it is not difficult to understand what is meant, but s. 49 of the Act of 1925, which is intended, according to the side-note, to apply the same principle to cases of partial intestacy—in other words, to remedy what was thought to be a defect in the Statute of Distribution, 1670—provides:

"Where any person dies leaving a will effectively disposing of part of his property, this Part of this Act shall have effect as respects the part of his property not so disposed of subject to the provisions contained in the will and subject to the following modifications: (a) The requirements as to bringing property into account shall apply to any beneficial interests acquired by any issue of the deceased under the will of the deceased, but not to beneficial interests so acquired by any other persons . . ."

I do not think that there is anything in the will in this case which deals with this matter. It is contended by counsel for Charles' personal representative that only a person who has acquired a beneficial interest under the will has to bring anything into account under s. 49 (a), and, therefore, Charles, who, as one of the testator's children, is entitled to a share of the part of the residue which was not disposed of after the widow's death, has nothing to bring into account because, in the events which happened, not he, but his children, took the one-seventh share which was settled on him and his children, and he himself never had more than a very limited interest in the income of that share at the discretion of the trustees—or, at the most, all that needs to be brought into hotchpot by Charles' estate is the interest which he took, viz., his life interest, which must be valued, and would, I suppose, be of very little value. The result would be that the whole fund would go to Charles's estate. The contrary view is that s. 49 (a) of the Act of 1925 is meant to produce, as it were, a stirpital division which is as equal as possible, and that is why the word "issue" is used here, although the word "children" is used in s. 47 (1) (iii). Any member of the family belonging to a certain branch must bring in everything that has been taken or acquired under the will by that branch. Therefore, in taking his share under the intestacy, Charles should bring into account the one-seventh share in which his children have taken an absolute interest under the will.

- A On the whole, I prefer the view last stated. It seems to me that "issue" in the words, "any beneficial interests acquired by any issue of the deceased," must mean children or remoter issue, and, therefore, that what is to be brought into account is the beneficial interest which the issue acquired. Who are the issue in question? The father and the children,
- B the two generations between them, are the issue, and it seems to me, therefore, that anything that the father and children together acquired under the will is a beneficial interest acquired by the issue. I would add that, although there was a trust, in the event of the whole or part of the income of Charles' share not being applied during Charles' lifetime for the benefit of him or his children, to apply it to other members of the family, that trust never arose and I think it should be ignored. I think that, in effect, Charles and his children
- C between them had the one-seventh share which was settled on them by the testator, and that is what, in my judgment, ought to be brought into account. Accordingly, I declare that, in the events which have happened and on the distribution of the one-seventh share of the testator's residue as to which, as from the death of the widow, he died intestate, the first defendant, as personal representative of Charles, is liable to bring into account the capital of the one-seventh share of the residuary estate settled by the will of the testator after the death of his widow on Charles and his children.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Morris and Parker, JJ.), October 24, 25, 27, 1950.]

Customs—Illegal export—Condemnation of goods by magistrate—Claimants ordered to pay five guineas costs—Appeal by claimants to quarter sessions against order of condemnation—Competency—Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839 (c. 71), s. 50—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (c. 36), s. 226.

Diamond brokers took to the General Post Office, London, parcels of diamonds addressed to the International Bank of Tangier, a "prescribed territory" within s. 23 (1) of the Exchange Control Act, 1947. The parcels were seized by a Customs officer under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 177, as goods the export of which was prohibited under s. 23 (1). Claims to the goods under s. 207 of the Act of 1876 were made by the diamond brokers, by the International Bank of Tangier as consignees, and by two American companies claiming to be purchasers of the diamonds. The brokers were convicted by a metropolitan magistrate of having brought the goods to a place for the purpose of being exported. The magistrate also considered the claims of the several claimants under s. 226 of the Act of 1876, adjudged the diamonds to be liable to be forfeited, condemned them, and awarded the Commissioners of Customs and Excise five guineas costs. On appeal, quarter sessions quashed the conviction of the brokers, and, holding that they had jurisdiction to entertain the appeals of the claimants against the order of condemnation, allowed those appeals.

HELD: the five guineas costs ordered to be paid was not a "sum or penalty adjudged to be paid" of "more than £3" within the meaning of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, s. 50, and, therefore, quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to entertain the claimants' appeals against the order of condemnation.

MOTION for certiorari.

The applicants were the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, and the respondents were claimants to three parcels of diamonds which had been condemned as forfeited by a metropolitan magistrate under the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 226, as applied by the Exchange Control Act, 1947, sched. V, Part III, para. 1 (1). The magistrate awarded the applicants five guineas costs against the respondent claimants. The appeal committee of London Quarter Sessions held that they had jurisdiction to entertain appeals against the order of condemnation and allowed the appeals. For the applicants it was contended that there was no right of appeal against the orders since they were not convictions and so were not within the terms of any general enactment conferring a right of appeal. For the claimants it was contended that the five guineas costs was a "sum or penalty adjudged to be paid" exceeding £3 and that, therefore, they were entitled to appeal under the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, s. 50. Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 27. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. In this case the Commissioners of Customs move for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash certain orders of the appeal committee of the County of London Sessions whereby they allowed appeals from a metropolitan magistrate who made orders condemning three parcels of diamonds as forfeited under s. 177 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, as applied by the Exchange Control Act, 1947, sched. V, Part III. The history of the matter, so far as it is necessary to state it, is that Hennig & Co., Ltd., who are diamond brokers in this country, took to the General Post Office the parcels of diamonds in question. The parcels were addressed to the International Bank of Tangier. The diamonds were seized at the post office by an officer of Customs on the ground that, being goods the export of which was forbidden, they were brought to a place for the purpose of export.

- A Section 177 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, so far as is material, provides that, if any goods which are prohibited to be exported shall be brought to any quay, wharf, or other place in the United Kingdom to be put on board any ship—which, by a subsequent amendment, includes an aircraft—for the purpose of being exported, all such goods shall be forfeited. Section 207 provides that whenever any seizure shall be made, unless in the possession or in the presence of the offender, master, or owner as forfeited under the Customs Acts, notice in writing of such seizure and of the grounds thereof shall be given. The section goes on to provide that, if any person gives notice that he claims or intends to claim the goods, proceedings shall be taken for the forfeiture and condemnation thereof either by information filed in the High Court or exhibited before any justice of the peace. By s. 226 it is provided that the justice shall
- C summon the owner of the goods to appear, and, on his appearance, due service of such summons being proved, such justice may proceed to the examination of the matter, and, on proof that the goods are liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts, may condemn the same.

- So far as the provisions of this Act are concerned, it will be observed that the sections to which we have referred create no offence, and that condemnation
- D and forfeiture is decreed quite independently of any person being convicted of any offence under the Act. By s. 23 of the Exchange Control Act, 1947, the export of goods of any class from the United Kingdom is prohibited subject to certain exceptions or conditions which do not exist in this case, and by sched. V, Part III, para. 1, it is provided that the enactments relating to Customs shall apply in relation to anything prohibited to be imported or
- E exported by any of the provisions of Part IV of the Act. It is further provided by para. 3 of Part III of the schedule that, if anything prohibited to be exported by any provision of the Act is exported or brought to a quay or other place for the purpose of being exported, the exporter or his agent shall be liable to the same penalty as that to which a person is liable for an offence under s. 186 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876. The bringing of prohibited goods to
- F a place for the purpose of export is thus for the first time made an offence.

- Notice of the seizure was given, with the result that claims to the goods were made by Hennig & Co. and also by A. G. Parser Incorporated of New York and the International Bank of Tangier, and in one case by Harry Winston Incorporated also of New York, the two New York companies claiming to be the purchasers from Hennig & Co. of the goods, and the International Bank
- G of Tangier claiming as the consignees. Hennig & Co. were summoned as the exporters who had brought the goods to a place for the purpose of being exported, and of this offence they were convicted by the magistrate. At the same time he had before him the claims of the various claimants in the forfeiture proceedings, and he found the forfeiture duly proved and adjudged the goods to be forfeited, condemned them accordingly, and awarded to the Commissioners of
- H Customs five guineas costs. Hennig & Co. appealed against their conviction to the London Sessions and all the claimants appealed against the order of forfeiture and condemnation. The appeal committee quashed the conviction of Hennig & Co., and on the appeal by the claimants against the order of forfeiture and condemnation they held they had jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and further held that, as they had allowed the appeal of Hennig & Co., it followed automatically that the orders for forfeiture fell with the conviction, and they, accordingly, allowed the appeals.

This order of certiorari is sought on the ground that the appeal committee had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal against forfeiture. It is a commonplace of the law that no appeal lies against the order of any court unless one is given by statute. It is not contended here that the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of the Acts extending the right of appeal to quarter sessions conferred on the claimants any right of appeal. Orders of condemnation are not convictions. The orders of condemnation do not depend on conviction, but, it is contended, the claimants, having been ordered to pay five guineas costs, thereby acquired a right of appeal under s. 50 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839. That section provides that in every case of summary order or conviction before any of the said magistrates (i.e., magistrates of the metropolitan police courts) in which the sum or penalty adjudged to be paid shall be more than £3 or in which the penalty adjudged shall be imprisonment for any time more than one calendar month, any person who shall think himself aggrieved by the order or conviction may appeal to quarter sessions. It is contended for the claimants that, as they have been ordered to pay five guineas costs, this gives them a right of appeal, although no such right is to be found in the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, or in the Summary Jurisdiction Acts in such a case. By s. 35 of the Inland Revenue Regulation Act, 1890, which replaces s. 209 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, provision is made whereby the commissioners may in their discretion mitigate any fine or penalty incurred under the Acts and compound or restore the property seized and condemned, and that seems to be the only method provided in the Customs Acts for any review of proceedings for forfeiture which may successfully be taken before justices. It is admitted that, if there had been no order for costs, or if the order for costs had been for a sum not exceeding £3, no appeal would lie, and the question, therefore, for decision is whether the words in s. 50 "in which the sum or penalty adjudged to be paid" include a sum ordered to be paid for costs.

A perusal of the Act shows that it gives power to metropolitan magistrates not only to convict of indictable and other offences, but also in certain circumstances to order sums of money to be paid. For instance, under s. 38 there is power to order compensation for wilful damage by tenants. Under s. 28 power is given in the case where goods have been unlawfully pawned, pledged or exchanged to order the goods to be delivered up to the owner without compensation or with such compensation as the magistrate may think fit. Under s. 32 a magistrate may award a party informed against a sum of not more than £5 if the magistrate is of opinion that the information was frivolous. Section 31 enacts that it shall be lawful for any magistrate who shall hear and determine any complaint to award such costs as to him shall seem meet to be paid to or by either of the parties to the said complaint. There is no question here of any penalty having been adjudged, and we find it impossible to hold that the words "the sum adjudged to be paid" were intended to apply to costs. We think they clearly refer to cases in which the Act enables magistrates to make orders for sums of money such as those to which we have just referred. They would also, no doubt, include duties of Customs which later Acts have made recoverable summarily.

We have, however, been referred to certain cases and reliance is more especially placed on a decision of this court in Cockhill v. Davies (1). In that case a metropolitan magistrate adjudged a recognisance to be forfeited and ordered the defendant to pay the sum of £750, the amount thereof. The court held that, although no appeal lay under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, an appeal would lie under s. 50 of the Act of 1839. VISCOUNT CALDECOTE, C.J., in giving judgment said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 640) there was there a summary order and that the words "summary order" were wide enough to include a direction by a magistrate that a recognisance be forfeited and the amount due under it be paid. We cannot, however, hold that case to be an authority for the proposition that s. 50 includes an order for the payment of costs. The proceedings in that case were to obtain an order for a sum of money, namely, the amount of the recognisance, and the order of the court was that a sum of £750 should be paid. No question was before the court in that case which in any way related to costs.

A The case most nearly analogous to the present is R. v. Warwickshire JJ. (2) —a case under the Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849. Section 14 provides that a party convicted shall pay such penalty, damage or compensation as the justice shall adjudge, order or award, together with the costs of conviction to be settled by such justices. Section 25 gives an appeal to quarter sessions in all cases where the sum adjudged to be paid on any conviction shall exceed £2. B The justices had convicted the applicant for the rule and fined him 2s. 6d. as a penalty and ordered him to pay £2 7s. 6d. for costs, and it was contended that, as the total amount which the defendant had to pay, was, accordingly, £2 10s. 0d., he had the right of appeal. The court, however, held that the sum adjudged to be paid in s. 25 related to the sum which the party was to pay by way of penalty or compensation and not to the costs, and said that they thought C the meaning of the Act was that where the subject-matter was of a slight nature so that the penalty or compensation was under £2 the matter was to rest where it was and was not to be removed into another court. CROMPTON, J., went on to say (6 E. & B. 842):

D “The provision for an appeal, in every case where there is imprisonment, is in favour of this view. We think that the right to appeal is to depend on the comparative gravity of the offence, and not on the amount of the costs, which do not depend on the nature of the offence, but vary according to the distance of the residence of the parties, the number of witnesses . . .”

E It is true that the court pointed out that s. 14 of itself obliged the defendant to pay the costs and said that the justices did not adjudge or award the costs, but only acted as a taxing master in fixing the amount. In that respect, no doubt, the Act we are now considering differs from the one in question in that case, because under s. 31 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, it is a matter for the justice to decide whether he awards costs or not, and his award of costs is, therefore, an adjudication. In our opinion, however, that is not the real ratio decidendi of the case. We think that what underlies the judgment F is that the existence of the appeal depended on the amount of the money ordered to be paid as a penalty independent of the question of costs. As the court in R. v. Warwickshire JJ. (2) took the view that the meaning of the Act was that no appeal lay where the subject-matter was so trivial that the penalty or compensation was not more than £2, so here we think it is clear the intention of this Act is not to give an appeal where the penalty or compensation, etc., does not exceed £3.

G Counsel for the claimant purchasers and consignees contended that the order is one and entire and that, as it did require their clients to pay a sum exceeding £3, that gave them a right of appeal against the order as a whole. As, in our opinion, costs are outside the purview of the section altogether, we do not think that this contention avails them. The fact is that there is no appeal and an award of costs does not give one. To decide otherwise would H lead to the absurd result that an appeal in respect of condemnation of goods worth over £100,000 would depend on whether the magistrate gave costs to the amount of £3 or more. Another result would be that a right of appeal would be given to a person whose goods were the subject of an order of condemnation in a metropolitan police court and nowhere else. It is true that that same anomaly was noticed in Cockhill v. Davies (1), and in Mittellmann v. Denman (3), where the court said that, though there might be an anomaly, it was a matter for the legislature to correct and not the courts. At the same time, such an anomalous result should be avoided unless the court feels constrained by the words of the Act to come to such a result.

We cannot part with this case without expressing some regret that in a matter of such magnitude the commissioners elected to go before a court of summary jurisdiction when the proceedings might have been brought in the High Court. We would call attention to the fact that citizens of another country were concerned in this case, and we cannot but suppose that it is a matter of considerable surprise and grievance to them to find that a case in which so much of their money was involved was brought before a police court, with no right of appeal, and that there was no power for them to insist on the matter being heard by a judge of the High Court. Had proceedings been taken by way of information, the matter could certainly have gone to the Court of Appeal, and, with leave, to the House of Lords. It should be borne in mind that conditions in 1876 were very different from those which prevail to-day, more especially since the provisions of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, have been applied to offences and proceedings under the Exchange Control Act, 1947. It does seem to us desirable that where the goods are claimed by persons against whom no proceedings are taken for a Customs offence, and, more especially, where those persons are foreigners, proceedings should be taken for condemnation in the High Court unless, indeed, the value of the goods is so low that proceedings in the High Court would not ordinarily be considered appropriate. There will be an order for certiorari and the orders of the appeal committee will be brought up and quashed.

Order for certiorari granted. No order as to costs.

BARRATT v. GOUGH-THOMAS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 4, 5, 6, 24, 1950.]

Solicitor—Lien—Title deed and mortgage deed—Solicitor acting for mortgagor and mortgagee—Deeds in custody of solicitor—Death of mortgagee—Solicitor co-executor—Transfer of mortgage to solicitor—Redemption—Right of solicitor to retain deeds.

A solicitor can claim a lien on title deeds in his custody against a person demanding their delivery if, but not unless, at the date of such demand his possession of them is referable to the relationship of solicitor and client between himself and the claimant. If this condition is not satisfied, the solicitor cannot make good his lien by showing that he originally received the deeds from the claimant as his client and subsequently retained physical possession of them down to some past date in the right and on behalf of the claimant, but that thereafter and at the date of the demand he retains them in the right and on behalf of some other person through whom the claimant now makes title.

In 1919 the plaintiff purchased certain freehold property, and the documents of title were left by him in the custody of the defendant as his solicitor. Later in the same year the plaintiff mortgaged the property to R. The defendant acted as solicitor for both parties, and, on completion of the mortgage, continued to retain the original documents of title together with the mortgage deed, and these documents of title were never removed from his custody. R. died in February, 1941, and in the following year his will was proved by the defendant and others, executors thereby appointed, and the documents were thenceforth held by the defendant on behalf of himself and his co-executors as joint mortgagees. On June 12, 1943, the plaintiff served on the defendant and his co-executors notice to redeem the mortgage. In redemption proceedings which ensued the defendant claimed to be entitled to a lien on the deeds of the property in respect of solicitor's costs incurred by the plaintiff both before and after the original deposit of the deeds in 1919, and asserted a right to withhold the deeds from the plaintiff on the redemption date unless, in addition to the payment of the mortgage debt and interest, the amount due to him for costs was paid. In January, 1946, the defendant took a transfer of the mortgage from the mortgagee's executors to himself alone and thenceforth held the documents in question as sole mortgagee, the redemption proceedings, accordingly, being stayed against the other executors. On Feb. 3, 1948, an order for redemption was made which left open the question of the defendant's claim to a lien, and, in February, 1949, the defendant applied by summons in the redemption proceedings, under the liberty to apply reserved by the order, for a declaration as to his right to a lien on the documents of title.

HELD: (i) the defendant's possession of the mortgage deed and the right to demand it from him which the plaintiff now had as a redeeming mortgagor were referable solely to the relationship of mortgagee and mortgagor, and not to that of solicitor and client, and, therefore, the defendant was not entitled to any lien against the plaintiff so far as the mortgage deed was concerned.

Sheffield v. Eden (1878) (10 Ch.D. 291), applied.

(ii) when a client for whom a solicitor held title deeds mortgaged the property comprised in them to another client of the same solicitor, then, even though the deeds before and after the mortgage remained continuously in the solicitor's possession, the solicitor held them after completion of the mortgage exclusively in the right and on behalf of the mortgagee. By this change in the character of the solicitor's possession of the deeds the solicitor's lien against the mortgagor was destroyed, since the conditions necessary to support it, namely, the mortgagor's right or title to the documents, had ceased to exist. Consequently, the defendant was not entitled to any lien on the documents.

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of ROMER, J., dated Mar. 21, 1950, whereby he held that the defendant, a solicitor, was not entitled to a lien on the documents of title of certain property belonging to the plaintiff.

The property in question was purchased by the plaintiff in June, 1919, and the documents of title were left in the custody of the defendant as his solicitor. In December, 1919, the plaintiff mortgaged the property to one Reece to secure a sum of £5,000. The defendant acted for both parties in this matter, and the documents of title were never removed from his custody. In February, 1941, Reece died and by his will appointed the defendant and three others as executors. In March, 1944, having previously given six months' notice to pay off the mortgage, the plaintiff instituted redemption proceedings against the executors, and these proceedings were adjourned into court for argument on the defendant's claim to a lien on the documents of title held by him. VAISEY, J., held ([1945] 2 All E.R. 414) that since the defendant had, by operation of law, become joint owner, subject to redemption, of the mortgaged property and the title deeds, the deeds must be regarded as having passed out of his custody as solicitor, and, since redemption involved the return, by the mortgagee, not only of the estate, but also of the indicia of the title to the estate, he was not entitled to any lien on the documents. The Court of Appeal reversed this order (ibid., 650) on the ground that it was premature. In January, 1946, the defendant took a transfer of the mortgage from the mortgagee's executors to himself alone and thenceforth held the documents in question as sole mortgagee. The redemption proceedings were, consequently, stayed as against the other three executors. In February, 1948, a redemption order was made. The question of the defendant's claim to a lien was expressly left open in the order, with liberty to apply. In February, 1949, the defendant applied by summons in the redemption proceedings for, inter alia, a declaration as to his lien on the documents of title. ROMER, J., following the decision of VAISEY, J., held that the defendant was not entitled to the lien claimed. On the present appeal against this decision, it was contended for the defendant that, having received the deeds in his professional capacity, the defendant became entitled to a lien over them so long as they remained in his physical possession, and that a lien so acquired continued to be available against any claim to possession of the documents regardless of any intermediate change in the ownership of the documents or in the identity of the person for whom the defendant held them.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 24. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : On June 13, 1919, the sale of certain freehold property at Oswestry to the plaintiff was completed, and the documents of title relating to such property were received by the defendant, the present appellant, as the solicitor for the plaintiff. Six months later, on Dec. 11, 1919, a first mortgage of the same property to a Mr. Reece was completed by the plaintiff. The defendant was also Mr. Reece's solicitor and on completion of the mortgage he continued to retain the original documents of title together with the mortgage and he has, in fact, continued to retain them ever since. No special agreement was made at any time between the plaintiff and the defendant in regard to the defendant's rights to retain the documents against the plaintiff. In 1941 Mr. Reece died. The defendant and three others became his personal representatives. On June 12, 1943, the plaintiff served on the defendant and the other co-executors, as successors in title to Mr. Reece, notice to redeem the mortgage on Dec. 14 following. At that time the defendant had ceased to act as the plaintiff's solicitor. On Dec. 2, 1943, the plaintiff's then and present solicitors asked for a statement of account showing the sum which would be due for principal and interest on the redemption date. In reply, on Dec. 4 the defendant claimed to be entitled to a lien on the deeds of the property in respect of solicitor's costs incurred by the plaintiff both before and after the original deposit of the deeds in 1919 and asserted a right to withhold the deeds from the plaintiff on the redemption date unless not only the mortgage debt and interest were paid to him and his co-executors, but there was also paid by the plaintiff the amount due to the defendant for costs. It is the validity of this claim for a lien which now, nearly seven years later, comes to this court for determination and which for five years held up the redemption of the mortgage.

The first step in the litigation was the issue by the plaintiff in March, 1944, of an originating summons for redemption of the mortgage in which proceedings he joined the defendant and, later, his co-executors. It was thought possible and convenient to try the question of the validity of the lien as an issue in the action, and the originating summons was, accordingly, adjourned into court and came on for hearing on July 10, 1945, before VAISEY, J. The learned judge held that on the redemption of the mortgage, i.e., on payment by the plaintiff of the sum due for principal and interest, the plaintiff was entitled to the delivery up of the documents of title relating to the property and that the defendant was not entitled to any lien in respect of such documents against the plaintiff. On an appeal by the defendant to this court the order of VAISEY, J., was discharged. This court expressed no view on the correctness, as a matter of principle, of VAISEY, J.'s, judgment, but was of opinion that the matter could not properly then be tried as part of the redemption proceedings, but before actual redemption. It was pointed out in the course of his judgment by LORD GREENE, M.R., not only that the interests of the defendant as solicitor were liable to be in conflict with the interests of his co-executors and himself as mortgagees, but also that at any time prior to actual redemption the defendant might have become bound to hand over the deeds to his co-executors or as they might direct so that at the critical point of time the deeds would not be in the defendant's possession and no question of a lien could then arise.

On Jan. 28, 1946, the defendant took a transfer to himself alone of the mortgage so that he then became sole mortgagee and all possible conflict of interest between himself and his co-executors was resolved. On Feb. 3, 1948, a redemption order was made and at the same time all further proceedings in the action against the second, third and fourth executors were stayed. It is unnecessary to refer at length to the terms of this order. Its effect was (or was treated by the parties as being) that the amount of interest in respect of the mortgage since Dec. 14, 1943 (being the date of expiry of the plaintiff's original notice to redeem) and the amount of certain costs of the defendant were to be separately certified, but on the plaintiff paying to the defendant the sum certified to be due for principal and interest on the mortgage up to Dec. 14, 1943, and paying into court the remaining interest and costs to be certified, the property was to be conveyed to the plaintiff, but that the defendant was to be entitled to retain physical possession of the title deeds pending the determination of the question of the defendant's lien, for which purpose the parties were to be at liberty to apply by separate summons in the action. The certificate contemplated by the order is dated Nov. 8, 1948. The plaintiff complied with the terms of the redemption order and redeemed the mortgage, and on Feb. 7, 1949, the defendant issued a summons in the action for the determination of his claim to a lien. The summons came before ROMER, J., on Mar. 21, 1950. ROMER, J., expressing no view of his own, followed the view expressed by VAISEY, J., in 1945 and declared that the defendant was not entitled to any lien. Against that order the defendant has again appealed and now the matter comes for a second time before this court.

The proceedings before VAISEY, J., and the Court of Appeal are reported at [1945] 2 All E.R. 414 and 650. I have, therefore, recited somewhat briefly the earlier narrative. It is, however, to be noted that it has been recently appreciated that the original conveyance to the plaintiff was dated in June, 1919, and not (as had previously in the proceedings been supposed) immediately prior to the mortgage to Reece. The circumstance does not affect the question to be tried, but it has, perhaps, emphasised an important distinction between the title deeds other than the mortgage deed, on the one hand, and the mortgage deed itself, on the other. There is no doubt that when the plaintiff deposited the deeds (other than the mortgage) with the defendant as his solicitor, the deeds were the property of the plaintiff who was immediately prior to such deposit entitled to their possession. There is, therefore, also no doubt that from the time of the deposit until the date of the mortgage the defendant was entitled to a lien on the deeds for his costs incurred for, and unpaid to him by, the plaintiff. The mortgage deed, however, from the moment of its execution and coming into existence as a deed was the property of the mortgagee, Mr. Reece, and, having regard to the decision of this court in Sheffield v. Eden (1), to which I shall later refer, counsel for the defendant felt unable to press any argument on the defendant's behalf for the existence of a lien as regards this document. Since the mortgage deed is now nearly thirty-one years old it must be confessed that the result is to rob the case of a considerable measure of its reality. I observe, finally, that, though the amount alleged by the defendant to be due for costs (much of which is, unless preserved by lien, said to be statute barred) is in dispute, it is conceded by the plaintiff that, if the defendant is entitled to his lien, there is some sum of costs in respect of which it may operate.

The essential features of the above recital are then: (i) At the time of the original deposit of the deeds (other than the mortgage) the defendant was acting as the plaintiff's solicitor and he continued to act as such until some date after the date of the mortgage and prior to the notice of redemption. (ii) At the date of the mortgage and until the transfer to himself of its benefit on Jan. 28, 1946, the defendant acted as solicitor to the mortgagee and (after the death of the mortgagee) to his estate, and (iii) the defendant has until the present time retained continuously in his physical possession the title deeds of the property, as to all such deeds (other than the mortgage itself) from the date of their deposit with him by the plaintiff in June, 1919, and as to the mortgage deed from the date of its execution in December, 1919. In these circumstances counsel for the defendant has contended (subject to the qualification already stated as regards the mortgage deed itself) that the lien, admittedly created by the plaintiff's original deposit, has never been lost and is available still to the defendant, and that it is immaterial that from and after Dec. 11, 1919, the defendant's possession of the deeds was attributable, or, as counsel for the defendant would have it, attributable primarily, to his capacity as solicitor for the mortgagee or his estate or to his capacity as mortgagee or one of the mortgagees.

The nature of a solicitor's general retaining lien has more than once been authoritatively stated. It is a right at common law depending, it has been said, on implied agreement. It has not the character of an incumbrance or equitable charge. It is merely passive and possessory, that is to say, the solicitor has no right of actively enforcing his demand. It confers on him merely the right to withhold possession of the documents or other personal property of his client or former client—in the words of SIR E. SUGDEN in Blunden v. Desart (2) (2 Dr. & War. 418):

“... to lock them up in his box, and to put the key into his pocket, until his client satisfies the amount of the demand.”

It is wholly derived from, and, therefore, co-extensive with, the right of the client to the documents or other property: see the statement of LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., in Pelly v. Wathen (3), cited by CHITTY, J., in Re Llewellyn (4) ([1891] 3 Ch. 148).

When the characteristics of the lien have been stated serious difficulties at once appear in the way of the contention of counsel for the defendant. In my judgment, the capacity by reference to which the documents are held is essential. The absence at any time of any right to or property in the documents on the part of the client seems, as a matter of principle, fatal to the continued existence of the lien. The fact that the mortgagee's solicitor is able to assert a lien against his client, the mortgagee, postulates a deposit of the deeds with the solicitor by the mortgagee, which appears necessarily inconsistent with the conception of a continuing deposit of the same deeds by the mortgagor, and since counsel admits that loss of possession in fact by the solicitor will (save in special circumstances) operate to determine the lien, its existence must to some extent be capricious and hazardous.

The matter is not, however, free from authority. Numerous cases were cited to us, but, as regards the law in England, three only of the authorities, or, perhaps, four, are directly in point. The first case—and it is the foundation on which the defendant's argument is found to rest and the foundation of the Irish decisions to which I refer later—is Colmer v. Ede (5) before STUART, V.-C. That was a foreclosure suit by a mortgagee, the defendants being the mortgagor's assignee in bankruptcy and Stretton, the solicitor. The essential facts were the same as those in the present case tabulated above. It was held that Stretton's lien had not been lost, but there are two observations to be made on the case. First, the general question of principle does not appear at all to have been considered. The argument for the assignee in bankruptcy seems to have been that there had been a special agreement which negated the lien. In default of such special agreement the lien appears to have been conceded. Secondly—and, perhaps, as a consequence—Stretton was, as I read the judgment, treated as an incumbrancer or as having rights analogous to those conferred by an incumbrance. Indeed, according to the report at 40 L.J.Ch. 187 the form of order made gave to Stretton liberty to redeem the property.

The second case Re Messenger, Ex p. Calvert (6), came six years later before SIR JAMES BACON, V.-C., sitting as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. The facts were, in essentials, again the same. The learned judge, founding himself on Colmer v. Ede (5), treated the law as settled. He said (3 Ch.D. 318):

“The law is clear that a person who from his position has a right of lien, does not lose that right unless there is some special agreement that he shall do so ... Is not then the result this, that the property was subject to the mortgage and also to the solicitor's lien. Colmer v. Ede (5) is a distinct authority ...”

The learned judge was prepared to accept the result that the mortgagee, on redemption and on the mortgagor's demand for delivery of the deeds, could be heard to refuse the demand on the ground of the solicitor's lien "which you have created and which I cannot destroy."

Seven years later, in 1883, the point again came before the same judge, SIR JAMES BACON, in Re Nicholson, Ex p. Quinn (7). The essential facts were indistinguishable from those in Colmer v. Ede (5) and Re Messenger (6) and both those cases were cited in argument, but the learned judge felt no hesitation or embarrassment in delivering a judgment wholly contrary in effect to his previous judgment in Re Messenger (6), and containing no reference either to that case or to its predecessor. He said (53 L.J.Ch. 303):

"A solicitor's right to a lien on deeds and papers depends on his possession and on the question for whom the deeds are held. There was a time when these deeds belonged to Nicholson; but the time came when he wanted money, and the appellants were requested to procure him an advance on these deeds, which they did, obtaining the money from another client. In so doing they undertook duties of a twofold character. It was their duty to deduce a good title for the mortgagee, and, when the money was paid, to hand the mortgagor's deeds to him. If they had declined to hand them over, the mortgagee could have compelled them to do so; and his right to compel the handing over of these deeds is totally inconsistent with any right being left in the mortgagor to continue to hold them. The title-deeds, on payment of the mortgage money, became the mortgagee's, and the mere fact that they remained in the hands of his solicitors, who happened also to be the solicitors for the mortgagor, cannot alter the rights of the parties."

The fourth case to which I have referred is Re Walker, Meredith v. Walker (8) before KEKEWICH, J. The facts were somewhat special. The personal representative of a solicitor was claiming against the personal representative of a testator a lien on certain policy moneys. The moneys arose from policies which had been transferred by the testator to the solicitor to enable the latter to raise moneys in Ireland on his principal's behalf and subject thereto to hold the policies on trust for the testator. It is, however, true to say that the learned judge referred to Messenger's case (6) as authority for the proposition that the solicitor's lien in circumstances such as those now under consideration was not lost. He said (68 L.T. 520): "There is no case against that view." Re Nicholson (7) was not cited. In my judgment, Re Walker (8) cannot in the circumstances be regarded as providing any substantial or added support for the defendant's argument.

The four cases to which I have referred appear to be the only English cases in the books directly in point in this appeal, for the report of the earlier case of Re Mosely (9) is admittedly too unsatisfactory to be of value. The matter stands, therefore, thus on the authorities. On the one hand, there is Colmer v. Ede (5), in which the question of principle was not, apparently, considered, but which was followed and treated as authoritative by SIR JAMES BACON, V.-C., in Re Messenger (6) and by KEKEWICH, J., in Re Walker (8), and on the other hand is SIR JAMES BACON's later and quite contrary decision in Re Nicholson (7). Other cases were cited to us on other aspects of the solicitor's lien. They cannot, therefore, be regarded as authorities directly on the point now in question. Yet they tend, in my view, in favour of SIR JAMES BACON's later opinion. In Re Snell (10) the question was on the same essential facts whether the solicitor could assert against his mortgagee client the lien which he claimed to have against his mortgagor client. No doubt, if the true view be that a solicitor in such circumstances must be taken in any case, in the absence of some contrary agreement, to have lost his lien against the mortgagor, that would have been a short and complete answer to the solicitor's claim. It is also true that neither Colmer v. Ede (5) nor Re Messenger (6) were cited in the argument, but SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said in the course of his judgment (6 Ch.D. 107):

A “ If the solicitor chooses to act not only for the mortgagee but for the mortgagor also, he is still equally bound, as solicitor to the mortgagee, to see that his client obtains a good security, including possession of the deeds; and if he has a bill of costs against his mortgagor client, he, by acting for both parties, loses his lien upon the deeds, and holds them for his mortgagee client, unless his lien is expressly reserved. He cannot say to his mortgagee client, ‘ I have been guilty of negligence; I do not hold the deeds on your account.’ He must be taken to have performed his duty, and to hold the deeds for his mortgagee client. That is his duty; and the fact that such client knew that he acted as solicitor for the mortgagor, and had a claim for costs against him, is therefore wholly immaterial. Moreover, the mortgagor, having authorised his solicitor to prepare the mortgage, has by so doing authorised him to act in a proper manner, that is, to do all necessary acts for the completion of the security, which of course includes handing over the title deeds. The solicitor requires no further instructions for that; he holds them as agent for the mortgagee client, and must therefore give them up to him when required to do so.”

BACON uses this language (16 Ch.D. 619):

Ex p. Fuller, Re Long (11) came before SIR JAMES BACON in 1881—between his two decisions of Re Messenger (6) and Re Nicholson (7). In that case the learned judge rejected the solicitor’s claim to a lien against the mortgagor in the case where the latter became his client after and not before the execution of the mortgage in favour of the solicitor’s mortgagee client. Counsel for the defendant accepts this conclusion, conceding that there must have been an original deposit of the deeds with the solicitor by the mortgagor and the existence of a lien before the transaction of mortgage. If the matter is to be judged by the standards of fairness and reason and if, as counsel contends, the conception is permissible of the solicitor’s possession of the deeds being primarily attributable to his capacity as agent for the mortgagee, but attributable also, and subject to the mortgagee’s rights, to his agency for the mortgagor, the distinction seems to my mind a little capricious. However that may be, in Re Long (11), SIR JAMES

“ The plain law is this, that a lien can only exist where there is a lawful possession of the thing upon which it is claimed by the person who claims it. What rightful possession of the deeds had the solicitors in the present case? The deeds were the deeds of the mortgagees, and they were placed in the solicitors’ hands only for safe custody. The solicitors had the deeds in their possession, not in any right of their own; their possession was that of the mortgagees, and nothing more.”

H
Finally, in Sheffield v. Eden (1) the question arose whether the solicitors who were themselves the mortgagees could assert a lien against their mortgagor client in respect of the mortgage deed itself. Sheffield v. Eden (1) is the only one of the cited cases which came before this court and JAMES, BAGGALLAY and THESIGER, L.JJ., rejected the solicitors’ claim. For that reason counsel for the defendant has felt unable to press his argument as regards the mortgage deed in the present case. It is true that all three judges in their very short judgments were careful to confine themselves to the particular question they had to decide, namely, the alleged lien on the mortgage deed. Colmer v. Ede (5) had been cited to them. Nevertheless, their reasoning clearly indicated, in my judgment, as had the reasoning of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Re Snell (10) and SIR JAMES BACON in Re Long (11), that the capacity in which the solicitor held the deeds is of the essence of the matter and that agency for the mortgagee is incompatible with agency at the same time for the mortgagor. JAMES, L.J., said (10 Ch.D. 293):

“ They might have had a claim against their client as mortgagor for [the] preparation [of the deeds], but when the deeds were executed they became the deeds of the solicitors. A lien only attaches to documents which are the client's property; it cannot extend to what is the solicitors' own property."

Similarly BAGGALLAY, L.J., said (ibid.):

"Directly these deeds were executed they remained in the possession of the solicitors, not in their capacity of solicitors to the mortgagor, but as their own property as mortgagees. The property was in them, not in their client."

In this state of the authorities it is clearly open to this court to decide the present question as a matter of principle. That being so, I think the judgment of SIR JAMES BACON in Re Nicholson (7) was correct and ought to be preferred to his own earlier decision in Re Messenger (6), and to the decision in Colmer v. Ede (5) which in Re Messenger (6) he had followed and that the two latter cases must be treated as wrongly decided. In my judgment, from the moment of the execution of the mortgage the solicitor's retention of the documents of title must be exclusively referable to his agency of the mortgagee, and the mortgagor has ceased to have any right or title to the documents from which any lien could be derived. The lien has ceased because the conditions necessary to support it have ceased to exist. On redemption of the mortgage it is the mortgagee's duty to hand back the deeds to the mortgagor: see Graham v. Seal (12) (88 L.J.Ch. 36, 38). That duty the solicitor, as the mortgagee's solicitor, is bound to perform. He cannot discharge the duty by handing the deeds to himself on the mortgagor's behalf unless he has the mortgagor's authority, as being still his client or otherwise by agreement, so to do. I think, accordingly, that the view suggested in CORDERY'S LAW RELATING TO SOLICITORS, 4th ed., p. 458, is erroneous and that the doubts expressed in the note (m) to the text are well-founded. Counsel for the defendant says that it is hard on the solicitor thus to lose his lien, but, if it be relevant to consider hardship, I cannot agree. It is open to the solicitor who acts also for the mortgagee to make it plain to his mortgagor client that before the mortgage is effected his bill for costs must be met or a special agreement made so as to preserve his lien. The opportunities of protecting himself are, I should have thought, less rather than more difficult for the solicitor where the proposed mortgagee is another of his clients.

I have earlier referred to the Irish decisions which followed Colmer v. Ede (5). Two Irish cases were cited to us, both at first instance, namely, Re Harvey's Estate (13) and Re Stannard's Estate (14). I think it would be possible to distinguish both cases on their facts from the present case, but, undoubtedly, in both the learned Irish judges treated Colmer v. Ede (5) as authoritatively stating the law applicable to such a case as the present: see per MONROE, J. (17 L.R.Ir. 67) in the first case, in which Re Nicholson (7) was not cited, and per ROSS, J. ([1897] 1 I.R. 419) in the second case where he expressly preferred Re Messenger (6) to Re Nicholson (7). With all respect to those two judges, I am, for the reasons I have given, unable to agree with them and I do not think their conclusions should now be followed in England.

We were also, finally, referred to the Scottish case in the Court of Session of Drummond v. Muirhead and Guthrie Smith (15). The essential facts are indistinguishable from those in this appeal and the Court of Session, affirming the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (LORD KINCAIRNEY), decided in the law agent's favour. Both SIR JAMES BACON's decisions were cited to the Lord Ordinary, but he, like ROSS, J., in Ireland, expressed his preference for Re Messenger (6). The decisions of the Court of Session are not, of course, binding on us. They are entitled to great respect and I am certainly not at all inclined to create divergencies between the law of England and the law of Scotland on such a matter as the general lien of a solicitor or law agent. Having given the matter my best consideration, I am unable, however, to reconcile the judgments of the Scottish judges with the principles which I think are applicable to such a lien in England. I think counsel for the plaintiff may be justified in suggesting that the Scottish judgments proceed on the basis that the right of the solicitor is in character analogous to that of an incumbrancer, and so it may be by the law of Scotland—at any rate the lien in Scotland cannot rest on the English common law.

A I have not so far distinguished the position of the defendant as solicitor to the mortgagee from his position as mortgagee himself either alone or jointly with his co-executors. In truth, there is for present purposes no distinction—certainly his position is not strengthened by his interest as mortgagee. If I am right in thinking that the capacity in which he holds the deeds is of the essence of the matter and that a present right or title to the deeds on the client's part is necessary to support the lien, the solicitor's claim is gone whichever of the two capacities, agent or principal, he assumes. If, as solicitor to the mortgagee, he seeks on redemption to retain the deeds against the mortgagor, he involves his client, the mortgagee, in a breach of his legal obligations, which the solicitor cannot, consistently with his duty as solicitor, do or be heard to suggest. On the other hand, if, as mortgagee, he seeks to retain the deeds on redemption, he is himself asserting a right inconsistent with his legal obligations. B C I, therefore, agree with the decision of VAISEY, J., when this matter was before him in 1945. At that time the defendant had not taken a transfer of the mortgage to himself alone, as he has since done. In my judgment, VAISEY, J., correctly anticipated the result of the transfer. He said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 416):

D “Suppose that the claimant in the lifetime of Reece had taken a transfer of the mortgage, thereby becoming sole mortgagee, and then suppose that the plaintiff had sought to redeem. In such a case the claimant would, in my judgment, have been bound not only to re-convey or otherwise release the mortgaged property to the plaintiff but also to restore to him the title deeds. Redemption involves the return by the mortgagee not only of the estate but of the indicia of the title to the estate. It seems to me that the claimant could not, in the case supposed, have been heard to say that in his capacity of solicitor he was entitled to preclude himself from discharging in full his duties as mortgagee—chiefly, as I think, for the reason that he would not be holding the deeds as solicitor at all but solely as mortgagee.” E

F In the passage which follows that which I have cited I think the learned judge went somewhat further than was justified or was necessary for his decision, but I think that his decision was right and that the present appeal ought to be dismissed accordingly.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree with the judgment just delivered by the Master of the Rolls. I also agree with the judgment about to be delivered by JENKINS, L.J., which I have had the advantage and pleasure of reading.

G JENKINS, L.J.: In this case the defendant, William Gough-Thomas, who formerly acted as solicitor to the plaintiff, Frank Digby Barratt, claims a lien on the documents of title relating to certain freehold property of the plaintiff at Oswestry, in the county of Salop, in respect of the costs, charges and expenses which became due from the plaintiff to the defendant while so acting, and the question for decision is whether, in the circumstances I am about to mention, this claim is well founded.

H The property in question was bought by the plaintiff in June, 1919. The defendant acted for the plaintiff in the matter of this purchase, and the documents of title were left by the plaintiff in the custody of the defendant as his solicitor. It is not in dispute that at this stage the defendant was entitled to the ordinary solicitor's lien on these documents for any costs owing to him by the plaintiff, whether in respect of that particular transaction or in respect of other professional services rendered to the plaintiff by him. In December, 1919, the plaintiff mortgaged the property to a Mr. Reece to secure a sum of £5,000 and interest, the mortgage taking the ordinary form under the law as it then stood of a conveyance of the property to the mortgagee in fee simple subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the moneys secured. The defendant acted for both parties in the matter of this mortgage, and the documents of title were never removed from his custody in which they have continuously remained to this day. It is, however, not open to doubt that from and after the completion of the mortgage the defendant ceased to hold the documents as solicitor to the plaintiff and held them thenceforth as solicitor to Mr. Reece, the mortgagee, who became as such exclusively entitled to their possession and control so long as the mortgage subsisted. Mr. Reece died in February, 1941, and in the following year his will was proved by four executors therein named, of whom the defendant was one, and the documents were thenceforth held by the defendant on behalf of himself and his three co-executors as joint mortgagees. In June, 1943, the plaintiff gave the usual six months' notice to pay off the mortgage, and in December of the same year the defendant asserted his claim to a lien on the documents for costs owing to him by the plaintiff, in addition to the amount due to the mortgagee's executors for principal, interest and costs under the mortgage itself.

In March, 1944, proceedings were instituted by the plaintiff against the mortgagee's executors for redemption of the mortgage, and in the following year the proceedings were adjourned into court for argument on the defendant's claim to a lien. The case came before VAISEY, J., who, in a considered judgment delivered on July 10, 1945 (see Barratt v. Gough-Thomas (16)), held that the defendant was not entitled to any lien on the documents in question and made a declaratory order accordingly. From that order the defendant appealed to this court, which, on Oct. 19, 1945, without expressing any view as to the correctness or otherwise of the decision of VAISEY, J., on the merits of the case, discharged his order on the ground that (for reasons already mentioned by the Master of the Rolls) it was premature: see [1945] 2 All E.R. 650. I should perhaps mention that in the proceedings so far described the conveyance and mortgage were treated as having both been executed on the same date, whereas they now appear to have been executed in June and December, 1919, respectively. It is, however, agreed that this variation in the facts has no material bearing on the legal result.

In January, 1946, the defendant took a transfer of the mortgage from the mortgagee's executors to himself alone and thenceforth held the documents in question as sole mortgagee, the redemption proceedings being accordingly stayed as against the other three executors who had thus ceased to have any further interest in the matter. On Feb. 3, 1948, an order for redemption was made, the master's certificate thereunder was signed on Nov. 8, 1948, and it appears that the directions therein contained as to payment and re-conveyance have been duly complied with. The redemption proceedings were thus at long last disposed of, apart from a question as to the defendant's right to interest after the expiration of the plaintiff's notice to redeem (with which we are not concerned) and the defendant's claim to a lien, which questions were expressly left open in the order for redemption, with liberty to apply. In February, 1949, the defendant applied by summons in the redemption proceedings, under the liberty to apply reserved by the order, for declarations as to his right to the disputed interest and to a lien on the documents of title, with consequential relief. By order dated Mar. 21, 1950, ROMER, J., declared that the defendant was not entitled to the lien claimed. As appears from his judgment delivered on the same date he founded his decision on the judgment of VAISEY, J., referred to above without expressing any opinion of his own, considering (in my view, quite rightly) that as the Court of Appeal had not formed any view as to the correctness or otherwise of this judgment on the merits of the case his duty as a judge of first instance was to follow it. Thus, while the present appeal is in form an appeal from the order of ROMER, J., in substance it involves a review of the reasoning which led VAISEY, J., to decide the matter adversely to the defendant on the previous occasion.

A The documents over which the lien is claimed comprise not only the title deeds originally left by the plaintiff in the hands of the defendant as his solicitor on the occasion of the plaintiff's purchase of the property, but also the mortgage deed subsequently executed by the plaintiff, and, when executed, left in the hands of the defendant as solicitor to Mr. Reece, the mortgagee. VAISEY, J., seems to have drawn no distinction between the former and the latter. There is, however, a distinction of some importance. The documents originally deposited with the defendant on the occasion of the purchase were, of course, the property of the plaintiff when so deposited, and admittedly then as against the plaintiff B became subject to the ordinary solicitor's lien in the defendant's favour, the question, so far as these documents are concerned, being whether that lien has remained in existence notwithstanding the subsequent events above referred to, involving as they did changes in the ownership and right to possession of these documents and the capacity in which they were held by the defendant. As will be seen hereafter, that question is not free from difficulty, and has been C the subject of a remarkable conflict of authority. The mortgage deed is in a different position. It never was the property of the plaintiff at all. From the moment of its execution and delivery it was the property of the mortgagee, and it came into the defendant's possession simply in his capacity as solicitor to the mortgagee. Whatever the position may be as regards the other documents, I think it is clear both in principle and on authority that in these circumstances D the defendant is at all events not entitled to any lien against the plaintiff so far as the mortgage deed is concerned. The defendant's possession of this deed and the right to demand it from him which the plaintiff now has as a redeeming mortgagor are referable solely to the relationship of mortgagee and mortgagor, and not to that of solicitor and client, which as between the defendant and the plaintiff never had any relevance to the receipt and retention of this deed by E the defendant: see Sheffield v. Eden (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal which apparently was not cited to VAISEY, J. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the defendant's claim must fail as regards the mortgage deed.

As regards the other documents, the argument for the defendant requires more detailed examination. It proceeds substantially on these lines: (i) A F solicitor who in his professional capacity receives deeds from a client becomes entitled to a lien over them so long as they remain in his physical possession. (ii) The lien so acquired continues to be available against any claim to possession of the documents by that client or any person claiming through him so long as physical possession of the documents is retained by the solicitor, and is not destroyed by any intermediate change in the ownership of the documents or in the identity of the person for whom the solicitor holds them. (iii) Thus, if G a client deposits title deeds with his solicitor and subsequently mortgages the property comprised in them to a third party for whom the solicitor also acts, and the solicitor without ever parting with physical possession of the documents retains them on behalf of his mortgagee client, his lien against the mortgagor client survives, though postponed to the paramount claim of the mortgagee to possession of the documents unless and until the mortgage is redeemed. H (iv) Further, in such a case the mortgagor client of the solicitor retains an interest in the documents corresponding to his equity of redemption in the mortgaged property, and it may thus be said that the solicitor, while holding the documents primarily for the mortgagee, yet continues to hold them quoad this subordinate interest for the mortgagor from whom they were originally received. (v) It follows that when the mortgagor redeems the mortgage and becomes entitled to possession of the documents, the solicitor is entitled to assert the lien to which they became subject at the time of the original deposit, and this notwithstanding the cesser in the meantime of the relationship of solicitor and client between himself and the mortgagor.

The defendant's argument finds support in a number of authorities. In Colmer v. Ede (5) the solicitor's lien against the mortgagor was upheld, but the lien seems there to have been disputed only on the ground that the deeds had been deposited with the solicitor for the specific purpose of preparing the mortgage, and not on the more general grounds advanced by the present respondent. Next in order of date is Re Messenger, Ex p. Calvert (6), a decision of BACON, V.-C., as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, which is closely in point and which, if accepted as a correct statement of the law, would conclude the present appeal in favour of the defendant. It should, however, be observed at once that in the later case of Re Nicholson, Ex p. Quinn (7), the same learned judge on substantially similar facts and after argument in the course of which Re Messenger (6) was cited, came to precisely the opposite conclusion. In Re Walker (8), KEKEWICH, J., followed Re Messenger (6), though it is fair to say that the facts differed in a possibly material respect from those in Re Messenger (6) and Re Nicholson (7), and that according to the report the latter case was not cited. There are also two Irish cases, Re Harvey's Estate (13) and Re Stannard's Estate (14), of which the latter, in particular, affords strong support for the defendant's contention, to which should be added the Scottish case of Drummond v. Muirhead & Guthrie Smith (15) to the like effect.

The argument for the plaintiff proceeds substantially as follows: (i) Retention of physical possession of documents of title by a solicitor acting for the two parties to a disposition of the property comprised in them does not necessarily preserve his claim to a lien against the party for whom he held the documents before the disposition. Regard must be had to the person for whom and the capacity in which the solicitor holds the deeds at the time when possession is claimed, and the lien can only be asserted if the solicitor then holds the documents in his capacity as solicitor to the party seeking to recover them. (ii) A solicitor's lien is a mere passive right to retain the documents, conferring no proprietary interest or charge, and available only against an owner of the documents entitled but for the lien to claim them as documents belonging to him and held on his behalf by the solicitor in the capacity of solicitor to the claimant. Thus, when the ownership of documents in a solicitor's possession passes from one client to another, with the result that he holds the deeds for the latter in place of the former, his lien against the former owner is necessarily destroyed, and can only be revived if and when the deeds once more become the property of the former owner and are once more held by the solicitor in the capacity of solicitor to that owner. (iii) In circumstances such as those of the present case the mortgagor's right to recover possession of the deeds on redemption is a right against the mortgagee, whose duty it is to return them to the mortgagor, and whose right to possession of them is admittedly paramount to any lien the solicitor may have had against the mortgagor prior to the mortgage. (iv) Where, as here, the solicitor himself takes over the mortgage, his possession of the deeds becomes possession in his own right as mortgagee, not possession in right of and as solicitor to the mortgagor and accordingly he can claim no lien against the mortgagor on redemption by the latter.

As regards the authorities more or less directly in point, the plaintiff's sheet anchor is Re Nicholson (7), and we are invited on his behalf to accept that decision as correctly stating the law in preference to the three English, two Irish, and one Scottish, decisions the other way. For my part, I think that of the English cases Re Nicholson (7) should be regarded as of the greatest weight. As a later decision of the same learned judge it must, I think, clearly be regarded as supplanting Re Messenger (6), especially as that case was cited to him in Re Nicholson (7). Re Walker (8), apart from the difference in the facts, loses much of its force from the circumstance that Re Nicholson (7) was not referred to. Colmer v. Ede (5) was, as I have said, argued on a different ground. The Irish and Scottish cases are, no doubt, worthy of the greatest respect, but I see no ground for preferring them to Re Nicholson (7), and the Scottish case may have turned to some extent on conceptions different from those of English law as regards the nature of liens and mortgages. The authorities standing thus, I conceive myself free to decide this case as seems to me right in principle, and, regarding it in this way, I have little hesitation in rejecting the defendant's claim.

I see no justification in principle for holding that the mere accident of continued physical possession of deeds by a solicitor, in circumstances such as the present, necessarily involves the continuance of his lien against the original depositor. No doubt, he loses his lien if he parts with possession, but this is far from establishing the converse proposition that if he retains possession his lien is necessarily preserved. When a client for whom a solicitor holds deeds mortgages the property comprised in them to another client of the same solicitor, who acts for both parties in the matter, then, even though the deeds before and after the mortgage remain continuously in the solicitor's possession, it is plain that after the completion of the mortgage the solicitor holds them exclusively in the right and on behalf of the mortgagee, and that the character and legal basis of his possession is precisely the same as if the deeds had been handed over to the mortgagee on completion of the mortgage and thereafter returned by him to the solicitor to hold on his behalf. I find myself in complete agreement with the view expressed by BACON, V.-C., in Re Nicholson (7) to the effect that in these circumstances the mere fact that the deeds remain in the hands of the solicitor because he happens to be solicitor to both parties cannot affect the result, and with his conclusion to the effect that in such a case the solicitor loses any lien he previously had against the mortgagor.

It is not in dispute that a solicitor can acquire a lien on deeds in his possession against a new owner of them without any change in their physical possession. Thus, in circumstances such as those now under consideration the solicitor would have a lien against his mortgagee client for costs owing to him from that client from the moment that he began to hold the deeds in the right and on behalf of the mortgagee. Again, it is plain that the solicitor can lose a lien on the deeds without parting with physical possession of them. Thus, from the moment he holds the deeds in the right and on behalf of the mortgagee he loses as against the mortgagor his lien for costs owing by the mortgagor: see Re Snell (10), Re Mason & Taylor (17). Similarly, when the mortgage has been paid off, the solicitor cannot assert against the mortgagor client a lien claimed in right of the mortgagee for costs owing to him from the latter, although he originally received the deeds as solicitor to the mortgagor and they have thereafter remained continuously in his possession: see Re Llewellyn (4). Again, mere possession of a client's deeds will not necessarily give the solicitor a lien upon them: see Ex p. Fuller, Re Long (11), where solicitors holding the deeds of mortgaged property received from a mortgagee client were held to have no lien on the deeds against the mortgagor for costs due to them from him because they had never held the deeds as his solicitor.

The right conclusion seems to me to be that a solicitor can claim a lien on deeds against a person demanding their delivery if, but not unless, at the date of such demand his possession of them is referable to the relationship of solicitor and client between himself and the claimant. If this condition is not satisfied the solicitor cannot make good his lien by showing that he originally received the deeds from the claimant as his client and has since retained physical possession of them down to some past date in the right and on behalf of the claimant, but thereafter and at the date of the demand retains them in right and on behalf of some other person through whom the claimant now makes title. This may be illustrated by the imaginary case of a sale of property by "A" to "B," the same solicitor acting for both parties and holding the deeds continuously for "A" down to the date of the sale and thereafter for "B." After the sale "A" changes his solicitor, and later re-purchases the property from "B." On completion of his re-purchase "A" demands the deeds. In such circumstances it is obvious that "A's" former solicitor (holding the deeds for "B") cannot assert any lien against "A" for costs due from him, the fact that the solicitor originally received the deeds from "A" as his solicitor and held them in that capacity down to the date of the sale to "B" and had never since parted with physical possession of them being wholly irrelevant.

Precisely the same reasoning seems to me to apply in the case of a mortgage. The fact that the mortgagor retains an interest in the form of his equity of redemption is, I think, immaterial. That gives him no right to possession of the deeds unless and until he redeems the property, and such right when it arises is a right against the mortgagee, not against the solicitor, who is simply bound to deal with the deeds as the mortgagee may direct and cannot set up against him or any person claiming through him any lien he formerly had against the mortgagor. I think this is borne out by the reasoning on which the judgment of CHITTY, J., in Re Llewellyn (4) proceeds although the lien there unsuccessfully asserted against the mortgagor was a lien claimed in right of the mortgagee for costs due from him to the common solicitor. There was on the facts of the case no question of any lien in respect of costs owing to the solicitor from the mortgagor personally, as admittedly none were so owed, but the learned judge said ([1891] 3 Ch. 147):

"I will assume in favour of the respondent [i.e., the solicitor] that though he received them originally from the applicant [i.e., the mortgagor] the custody was changed; that he afterwards held them as solicitor for the mortgagee. The lien claimed on the documents of title is thus a lien in virtue of the right of the mortgagee to hold such documents."

Then he says of the lien (ibid., 148):

"It does not confer on the solicitor any higher right to retain deeds than the client himself has."

After citing a number of authorities in support of this proposition he continues (ibid.):

"From these it follows, that when the mortgagor has paid to the mortgagee all that is due to him . . . and the mortgagee has given the mortgagor a release, the mortgagee's solicitor has no right to retain the deeds as against the mortgagor, even for costs due to the solicitor from the mortgagee for work done relating to the mortgaged property pending the mortgagee."

By parity of reasoning, and, indeed, a fortiori, it seems to me that the solicitor holding the deeds in virtue of the right of the mortgagee to hold them cannot set up against the mortgagor a lien for costs due from the latter which not only could not be set up by the mortgagee himself against the mortgagor, but could not even be asserted by the solicitor against the mortgagee. Re Llewellyn (4) thus, in my view, bears out the direct authority of Re Nicholson (7). The same may, I think, be said of the ratio decidendi in Sheffield v. Eden (1), although (as appears above) the actual decision in that case is confined to the mortgage deed itself.

The theory that the solicitor's lien against the mortgagor client survives after his custody of the deeds is changed to custody as solicitor for the mortgagee client, though subject to the paramount right of the mortgagee to their possession, seems to me clearly inconsistent with the nature of the lien as defined in Re Llewellyn (4) and the cases there cited, particularly Blunden v. Desart (2) and Pelly v. Wathen (3). The lien being neither the result of contract, nor an equitable charge, nor an incumbrance on the estate, but merely a right of the solicitor

“ to keep back from his client the deeds and papers, which he holds as solicitor, until his bill of costs is satisfied ” (per LORD CRANWORTH, L.J., in Pelly v. Wathen (3) (1 De G.M. & G. 23), it is difficult to see how, once the solicitor has ceased to hold the deeds for the mortgagor and holds then for the mortgagee, whose right to possession completely ousts that of the mortgagor and is free from any lien the solicitor could previously have asserted against the latter, the lien against the mortgagor can fail to be completely extinguished not merely as against the mortgagee but against the mortgagor also. A new lien against the mortgagor might no doubt arise if in the circumstances of the particular case the solicitor could be shown after the discharge of the mortgage to have resumed custody of the deeds in the capacity of solicitor to the mortgagor, but no such circumstances exist in the present case.

In the course of his argument for the defendant counsel pointed out that a solicitor's lien against his client may continue though the relationship of solicitor and client has ceased, as, for example, where the client changes his solicitor, or on the death of the solicitor or the client, but this carries the defendant's argument no further. In such cases the possession of the deeds on the strength of which the lien is asserted is still referable entirely to the relationship of solicitor and client formerly subsisting between the original parties even though that relationship has been brought to an end, and the rights appropriate to possession so referable survive accordingly. In the type of case now under consideration there is not merely a cessation of the relationship of solicitor and client between the solicitor and the person for whom the deeds were held, but a change in the character of the solicitor's possession of the deeds from possession as solicitor to and on behalf of the original client (the mortgagor) to possession as solicitor to and on behalf of a different client (the mortgagee), and it is by this change that the solicitor's lien against the mortgagor is destroyed.

It follows from what I have said above that I am in substantial agreement with the views of VAISEY, J., on the aspect of the case which he made a subsidiary basis of his decision (i.e., the effect on the lien of the mortgage transaction in which the defendant acted for both parties). Logically, however, I think this aspect of the case comes first, as, if the defendant lost his lien from the moment he held the deeds as solicitor to and on behalf of the mortgagee, it is unnecessary to consider whether apart from this the lien would in any event have been lost when the defendant subsequently assumed office as one of the four executors of the mortgagee and later (since the date of VAISEY, J.'s judgment) took a transfer to himself of the mortgage. At all events it is abundantly plain that neither of these subsequent events can have improved the defendant's position in regard to the lien he claims. Accordingly, while by no means dissenting from what has been said by the Master of the Rolls on this aspect of the case, for my part I find it unnecessary to express any opinion on the effect of these later transactions as it might have been if the case had depended on them alone. In the result I agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

EDWARDS AND ANOTHER v. HALLIWELL AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 31, November 1, 2, 1950.]

Trade Union—Action by member against union—Matter of substance, tintured with oppression—Invasion of members' individual rights.

Rule 19 of the rules of the defendant trade union provided: "The regular contributions of employed members shall be as per tables . . . and no alteration to same shall be made until a ballot vote of the members has been taken and a two-thirds majority obtained." In December, 1943, a delegate meeting of the union, without taking any ballot, passed a resolution increasing the amount of the contributions of employed members. The plaintiffs, two members of the union, claimed against two members of the executive committee of the union and the union itself a declaration that the alteration adopted at the delegate meeting was invalid.

HELD: (i) as the matter in question was not a mere irregularity in the internal management of the union, but was a matter of substance and tintured with oppression, the court would grant the plaintiffs relief if it was proper to do so.

Amalgamated Society of Engineers v. Jones (1913) (29 T.L.R. 484), distinguished.

(ii) it was implicit in the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1843) (2 Hare 461) that the matter relied on as constituting the cause of action should be a cause of action properly belonging to the general body of members of the association in question as opposed to a cause of action which some individual member could assert in his own right. In the present case, the personal and individual rights of membership of the plaintiffs had been invaded and particular damage inflicted by the invalid alteration of the tables of contributions, and in such circumstances the rule in Foss v. Harbottle had no application to individual members who were suing, not in the right of the union, but in their own right to protect from invasion their individual rights as members, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to their declaration.

Pender v. Lushington (1877) (6 Ch.D. 70), applied.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: The rule in Foss v. Harbottle does not prevent an individual member suing if the matter in respect of which he is suing can validly be done, not by a simple majority of the members of the association, but, as in the present case, only by some special majority: Cotter v. National Union of Seamen ([1929] 2 Ch. 58), applied . . . I cannot regard the paying by the majority of the members of the increased rates without demur as equivalent to a ballot vote at which a two-thirds majority was obtained in favour of the alteration.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of VAISEY, J., dated July 28, 1950.

The plaintiffs, two members of the Cricklewood branch of the defendant union, claimed a declaration on behalf of themselves and all other members of the branch that the alteration of the general rules of the union adopted at a delegate meeting in December, 1943, was invalid in so far as it purported to alter the amount of the regular contributions of employed members. The defendants were two members of the executive committee of the union sued as representatives of the committee and the union. VAISEY, J., granted the declaration. The facts appear in the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and Lindner for the defendants.

A Milner Holland, K.C., and Hesketh for the plaintiffs.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I will ask ASQUITH, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

ASQUITH, L.J.: This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of VAISEY, J., whereby he made a declaration asked for by the plaintiffs in terms to which I will refer. The plaintiffs sue on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Cricklewood branch of the National Union of Vehicle Builders, a registered trade union. The defendants are sued on behalf of themselves and all other members of the executive committee of the union, and the union itself is joined as a defendant.

B The main point in the appeal is whether VAISEY, J., has rightly construed r. 19 of the rules of the union. The defendants contend that, even if he has rightly construed that provision, the plaintiffs are precluded, for other reasons, from obtaining the relief which they have been awarded. The only relevant part of r. 19 is the first five lines, which are:

C "The regular contributions of employed members shall be as per (pp. 115 and 116) and no alteration to same shall be made until a vote of the members has been taken and a two-thirds majority obtained."

D In December, 1943, a delegate meeting was held at which the delegates, without any ballot, let alone a ballot resulting in a two-thirds majority, purported to increase the regular contributions of employed members and also certain benefits payable to the members. The plaintiffs contend that that alteration in the contributions is a nullity because the condition precedent to its validity laid
E down in r. 19 had not been satisfied. They refused to pay the amount of the increase, and were threatened or actually visited with loss of their rights as union members, including that of eligibility for election to certain offices. In the action they claimed:

F "A declaration that the alteration of the general rules of the National Union of Vehicle Builders adopted at a delegate meeting in December, 1943, is invalid in so far as it purports to alter the regular contributions of employed members."

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the rules of the union; held that, on construction of them, the alteration in December, 1943, of the rates of contribution was invalid, and continued:] The other point relied on by the defendants was that, even if they
G were wrong on the point of construction, the court either could not, or should not, grant the plaintiffs the relief which they claim. Under this head counsel for the defendants relied on the alleged principle that, when an action is brought by an individual in respect of a mere irregularity in a matter that is intra vires a trade union and concerns its internal management, the court will not as a rule intervene. For this purpose he conceded that a "mere irregularity" meant H something not involving fraud, oppression or unfairness. I confess I should have thought the action complained of here was strongly tinged, not, indeed, with fraud, but with "oppression" and "unfairness." Here were men who had a right not to have their contributions increased except after a ballot resulting in a two-thirds majority. This right was clearly violated. An unauthorised increase was sought to be extorted, and when they refused to pay, as they were entitled to do, severe penalties were imposed or threatened. To call this a mere informality or irregularity without any element of oppression or unfairness would be an abuse of language. When in circumstances such as I have described a remedy is sought by an individual, complaining of a particular act in breach of his rights and inflicting particular damage on him, it seems to me the principle of Foss v. Harbottle (1), which has been so strongly relied upon by the defendants, does not apply either by way of barring the remedy or supporting the objection that the action is wrongly constituted because the union is not a plaintiff. Nor, lastly, can I accept the submission that, if the action is maintainable at law, it should nevertheless be dismissed because the vast majority of members approved the action taken by the defendants. The answer to the defendants' argument under this head will, I hope, be presented more fully by my Lords who are much more familiar with this branch of the law than myself. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: I will pass to the argument based on the reluctance of the court to interfere with the domestic affairs of a company or association on the ground of mere irregularity in form in the conduct of those affairs, and the argument based on the more general proposition commonly called the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1). As to the contention that, even though the purported alteration of the tables of contributions was invalid, the court should not interfere because the omission to hold a ballot and obtain a two-thirds majority as required by r. 19 was a mere irregularity in point of form, in my judgment, that argument can be shortly dismissed by saying that this was not a matter of form. It was a matter of substance. The relevant part of r. 19, I conceive, was designed to protect members against increases in the rates of contributions unless those increases were agreed to by a particular majority of members on a vote obtained in a particular way—that is to say, a two-thirds majority on a ballot vote. It seems to me that the executive committee's disregard of that express provision in the rules was a wrong done to each individual member on a point of substance. I say "on a point of substance," because it is nihil ad rem to point out that the increases in question were merely a matter of pence per week. In my judgment, this question should be viewed in precisely the same way as if the increase had been a matter of pounds, which might have made a substantial difference to the financial position of the members. In my judgment, the case cited on this part of the argument—Amalgamated Society of Engineers v. Jones (2)—has no bearing on the facts of the present case. In that case a meeting had been held and certain resolutions passed, and it was suggested that the mode of convening the meeting was irregular. The learned judge was able to hold that there had been no wrong done as a matter of substance, but that there had been a mere irregularity in procedure and he took the view that, in those circumstances, the court should not interfere. For the reasons I have endeavoured to state, I regard the present case as an entirely different one.

The rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1), as I understand it, comes to no more than this. First, the proper plaintiff in an action in respect of a wrong alleged to be done to a company or association of persons is prima facie the company or the association of persons itself. Secondly, where the alleged wrong is a transaction which might be made binding on the company or association and on all its members by a simple majority of the members, no individual member of the company is allowed to maintain an action in respect of that matter for the simple reason that, if a mere majority of the members of the company or association is in favour of what has been done, then cadit questio. No wrong had been done to the company or association and there is nothing in respect of which anyone can sue. If, on the other hand, a simple majority of members of the company or association is against what has been done, then there is no valid reason why the company or association itself should not sue. In my judgment, it is implicit in the rule that the matter relied on as constituting the cause of action should be a cause of action properly belonging to the general body of corporators or members of the company or association as opposed to a cause of action which some individual member can assert in his own right.

The cases falling within the general ambit of the rule are subject to certain exceptions. It has been noted in the course of argument that in cases where the act complained of is wholly ultra vires the company or association the rule has no application because there is no question of the transaction being confirmed by any majority. It has been further pointed out that where what
A has been done amounts to what is generally called in these cases a fraud on the minority and the wrongdoers are themselves in control of the company, the rule is relaxed in favour of the aggrieved minority who are allowed to bring what is known as a minority shareholders' action on behalf of themselves and all others. The reason for this is that, if they were denied that right, their grievance could never reach the court because the wrongdoers themselves,
B being in control, would not allow the company to sue. Those exceptions are not directly in point in this case, but they show, especially the last one, that the rule is not an inflexible rule and it will be relaxed where necessary in the interests of justice.

There is a further exception which seems to me to touch this case directly. That is the exception noted by ROMER, J., in Cotter v. National Union of Sea-
C men (3). He pointed out that the rule did not prevent an individual member from suing if the matter in respect of which he was suing was one which could validly be done or sanctioned, not by a simple majority of the members of the company or association, but only by some special majority, as, for instance, in the case of a limited company under the Companies Act, a special resolution duly passed as such. As ROMER, J., pointed out, the reason for that exception
D is clear, because otherwise, if the rule were applied in its full rigour, a company which, by its directors, had broken its own regulations by doing something without a special resolution which could only be done validly by a special resolution could assert that it alone was the proper plaintiff in any consequent action and the effect would be to allow a company acting in breach of its articles to do de facto by ordinary resolution that which according to its own regulations
E could only be done by special resolution. That exception exactly fits the present case inasmuch as here the act complained of is something which could only have been validly done, not by a simple majority, but by a two-thirds majority obtained on a ballot vote. In my judgment, therefore, the reliance on the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1) in the present case may be regarded as misconceived on that ground alone.

F I would go further. In my judgment, this is a case of a kind which is not even within the general ambit of the rule. It is not a case where what is complained of is a wrong done to the union, a matter in respect of which the cause of action would primarily and properly belong to the union. It is a case in which certain members of a trade union complain that the union, acting through the delegate meeting and the executive council in breach of the rules by which
G the union and every member of the union are bound, has invaded the individual rights of the complainant members, who are entitled to maintain themselves in full membership with all the rights and privileges appertaining to that status so long as they pay contributions in accordance with the tables of contributions as they stood before the purported alterations of 1943, unless and until the scale of contributions is validly altered by the prescribed majority obtained
H on a ballot vote. Those rights, these members claim, have been invaded. The gist of the case is that the personal and individual rights of membership of each of them have been invaded by a purported, but invalid, alteration of the tables of contributions. In those circumstances, it seems to me the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1) has no application at all, for the individual members who are suing sue, not in the right of the union, but in their own right to protect from invasion their own individual rights as members.

I would be content so to hold as a matter of self-evident principle, but the matter is not free from authority. It will, I think, be enough for the present purposes if I refer, briefly, to a passage in the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Pender v. Lushington (4). There was a discussion in the course of the case whether the action was one which an individual shareholder could maintain and SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., said (6 Ch.D. 80):

"But there is another ground on which the action may be maintained. This is an action by Mr. Pender for himself. He is a member of the company, and whether he votes with the majority or the minority he is entitled to have his vote recorded—an individual right in respect of which he has a right to sue. That has nothing to do with the question like that raised in Foss v. Harbottle (1) and that line of cases. He has a right to say, 'Whether I vote in the majority or minority, you shall record my vote, as that is a right of property belonging to my interest in this company, and if you refuse to record my vote I will institute legal proceedings against you to compel you.' What is the answer to such an action? It seems to me it can be maintained as a matter of substance, and that there is no technical difficulty in maintaining it."

In my judgment, precisely the same conclusions as are there expressed apply in the present case, and the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (1) affords no answer to the action. It was sought to show that this was not a matter affecting the individual rights of any particular member of the union because all were subject to the same alteration of the tables and, therefore, it was a matter which affected the general body of members as a whole. I do not agree. For one thing, the contributions to be paid by any individual member would depend on the particular category of membership to which he belonged, but, for another thing and more important, it seems to me that, although all the members are liable to pay the subscriptions appropriate to their respective categories, the right of each member to maintain himself in membership by paying his subscription—that is to say, by paying whatever subscription appropriate to his case is validly fixed and for the time being in force under the rules—is an individual right of his own which he himself is entitled to protect by an action on his own behalf.

It was pointed out in the course of the argument (though the matter was not fully developed) that the vast majority of members of the union had, in fact, paid without demur subscriptions at the new and invalid rate. It was further pointed out that those who had become entitled to benefits had taken benefits at the enhanced rate. It was further pointed out that in practice r. 19 (1) had never been resorted to for many years. Before VAISEY, J., these matters seem to have been put forward as amounting to such acquiescence as to make r. 19 (1) a dead letter which could no longer be enforced. That argument was not pressed before us, but these considerations were put as showing that the case was without substance. It was said that the fact that the vast majority of members had paid the new rate of subscriptions without demur demonstrated that the will of the union as a whole was in favour of the new subscriptions and consequently the action was without substance. I cannot agree. I cannot regard the mere paying by individual members of the increased rates without demur as equivalent to a ballot vote at which a two-thirds majority was obtained in favour of the alteration. In my judgment, the scale of contributions as fixed in the rules before the disputed alteration must stand unless and until altered in accordance with r. 19. It not having been so altered, the rates so fixed remain the only rates properly exigible, and no member is bound to pay any other rate except as a matter of individual consent. It may well be that in most cases it would be found, when the particular member's account was gone into, that he had by his conduct in paying the new rate of subscription expressed his individual consent to the alteration and thereby become bound, but I see no ground in principle or in authority for holding that these individual assents arising from the conduct of individual members can have any binding effect at all on those members who say: "We are prepared to pay the contributions validly exigible under the rules and no more." Accordingly, I agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I am entirely of the same opinion.

A On the question of the construction of the rules, the point was debated whether a delegate conference could validly by ordinary resolution of the conference revise r. 19 (1) by the abrogation or suspension of the words of prohibition on which the plaintiffs' action has been founded and then proceed by a further ordinary resolution to alter the rates of contribution payable, thereby avoiding any need to have a ballot or to obtain a two-thirds majority upon a ballot. I am not satisfied that, if a delegate conference made such an alteration or

B revision of r. 19 as a mere prelude to the alteration of the rates of contribution, such a procedure would successfully withstand challenge. If it is the desire of those responsible for the administration of the affairs of this union either to abrogate altogether the relevant prohibition in r. 19 or to make it inapplicable to an alteration of contribution rates by a delegate conference, I think prudence would demand that such a revision should receive the confirmation of the

C necessary two-thirds majority. Upon the Foss v. Harbottle (1) point, I should be guilty of repetition if I added anything to the reasons given by JENKINS, L.J., with which I find myself in entire agreement. The appeal fails and will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

By his will, dated Mar. 30, 1931, a testator, who died on Jan. 19, 1943, appointed a bank and two persons to be his executors and directed the payment of legacies and shares of his residuary estate to certain persons resident in Germany. By a codicil, dated May 31, 1940, he appointed F. and J. to be his executors with the bank in place of the persons appointed by the will, and declared that if, at the time of his death or at any time before his trustees had wound up his estate, legislation was in force in the United Kingdom by which some beneficiaries were deprived of the right to receive their benefits, then: "I give such benefits to my trustees absolutely with the request but without creating any trust that they will carry out the wishes contained in my said will or any codicil thereto when legislation permits them to do so." On Mar. 20, 1945, COHEN, J., held that, on the true construction of the will and codicil, the legacy and shares of residue thereby given to persons who survived the testator and were at his death enemies within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, were payable to the bank, F., and J. beneficially. On Nov. 19, 1945, the bank executed a deed in which the parties were described as the bank, of the one part, and F. and J. ("the beneficiaries"), of the other part. The deed, which was not executed by F. or J., recited the will and codicil (to both of which it was made supplemental), the order of Mar. 20, 1945, and that the bank was desirous of executing a release of the interests to which it was entitled under the will and codicil, and it witnessed that "in pursuance of the said desire the bank doth hereby disclaim all that the share and interest of the bank of and in the legacies and share of residue referred to in the said order."

HELD: the bank, F., and J. were beneficial joint tenants under the will and codicil, and, there having been no severance of the joint tenancy, the deed could not operate as a disclaimer, but it operated as a release to F. and J. of the bank's beneficial interests.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for the determination of the question whether, on the true construction of the will and codicil of Ernst Friedrich Schar, deceased, and in the events which had happened, certain interests under the said will and codicil, declared by an order of COHEN, J., dated Mar. 20, 1945, to be vested in the deceased's executors beneficially, were, having regard to the purported disclaimer of one of the executors, vested in the remaining executors or in the Custodian of Enemy Property. The relevant facts appear in the judgment.

D. H. Cohen for the plaintiffs, the Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd.

W. F. Waite for the first and second defendants, the two other executors.

Denys B. Buckley for the third defendant, the Custodian of Enemy Property.

VAISEY, J.: This is a curious point, and one on which there is very little authority to guide me. The testator, Mr. Ernst Friedrich Schar, made his will on Mar. 30, 1931. He appointed the plaintiff company, the Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd., and certain other persons to be his executors. He directed them to sell his residuary estate and invest the net proceeds, and to pay the income of those investments to his wife during her life. After her death, which occurred on Jan. 19, 1942, i.e., in the lifetime of the testator, he gave legacies to a certain beneficiary who lived in Germany. He gave the ultimate residue to be divided in certain shares among certain people, all (or some) of whom were resident in Germany. On May 31, 1940, he made a codicil to his will revoking the appointment of the persons who were to be the executors with the bank and in their stead appointing the first two defendants, Mr. Frederick Charles Damer and Mr. Joseph Guggenheim, to be executors with the bank. By cl. 6 of the codicil he directed that if at the time of his death or at any time before his trustees had wound up his estate and paid or transferred to the beneficiaries their benefits legislation was in force in the United Kingdom by which the said benefits became charged in favour of some other person or persons or corporation or the said beneficiaries were or might be deprived of the right to receive the benefits given to them, then:

"I give such benefits to my trustees absolutely with the request but without creating any trust that they will carry out the wishes contained in my said will or any codicil thereto when legislation permits them to do so."

On Jan. 19, 1943, the testator died. His will was proved later in the same year by the plaintiffs and the first two defendants, the net estate being of the value of some £30,000.

For reasons which are quite intelligible the bank felt some embarrassment in having thrust on it, apparently as beneficial owner, property of the testator of whose will it was one of the executors, and the matter came before the court. On Mar. 20, 1945, COHEN, J., declared that

A " . . . upon the true construction of the will and codicil . . . and in particular of cl. 6 of the said codicil and in the events which have happened legacies and shares of residue thereby given to persons who survived the testator and were at his death enemies within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, and any orders made thereunder are payable to the plaintiffs [the bank] and the defendants Damer and Guggenheim beneficially."

B The embarrassment of the bank was thereby intensified, and to relieve itself of it, on Nov. 19, 1945, the bank executed a deed in which it as a party of the one part carried out an operation the effect of which I have to determine. The parties of the other part were Mr. Damer and Mr. Guggenheim, therein defined as "the beneficiaries." It is, of course, not conclusive, but it is significant that those two personal executors should be made parties to this document. The recitals to the deed are, first, that "these presents are intended to be supplemental to the will and codicil" of the testator, and, secondly, a recital
C setting out the effect of the order of COHEN, J. The third recital is:

"The bank does not intend and has never intended to accept or take advantage of any interests to which it is entitled beneficially under the will and codicil of the testator and is desirous of executing such release as is hereinafter contained."

D There follows the one short clause comprising the operative part of the deed:

"This deed witnesseth that in pursuance of the said desire the bank doth hereby disclaim all that the share and interest of the bank of and in the legacies and share of residue referred to in the said order."

E Two views can be taken of this document. First, it is said that it is a disclaimer, and, secondly, that it is a release. It will be observed from what I have said that in the last recital the bank expresses the intention of executing a release, and in the operative part it purports to exercise a right, or claim a privilege, of disclaimer. I am bound to add that, if it was a disclaimer into the air, so to speak—a shaking off of the embarrassing benefit which the combined effect of the will and the order of COHEN, J., had imposed on the bank, I find it rather
F curious that the other two parties should have been made parties of the other part, and it looks to me as though the intention, so far as one can make it out, was that the parties of the other part were in some way to benefit by this document. If it was a pure disclaimer, I should have thought that the proper form was that of a deed poll. However that may be, here is a document inter partes, the bank, of the one part, and the other two executors and trustees, of the other
G part. It is expressed as a disclaimer and prefatorily called a release in the recital. There is no indication whatever how "the beneficiaries," the first two defendants, come in—what they are supposed to be doing and what they would get out of it.

This summons came before me as long ago as May, 1947, and the question which was asked me then and is repeated now, was:

H "Whether upon the true construction of the will and codicil of the testator and in the events which have happened [in particular, the order of COHEN, J., and, secondly, the deed of Nov. 19, 1945] (a) the interest declared by the said order to be vested in the plaintiffs and the first and second defendants is now vested in the first two named defendants as joint tenants or otherwise; or (b) whether a one-third share of the said legacies and share of residue or some other and what share devolves on the last named defendant as the Custodian of Enemy Property."

In May, 1947, the matter stood over because it was suggested that the bank under its objects had no power to give away property to which it was entitled. Now, after three and a half years, the bank come back to me with further evidence which shows clearly that the bank did not know nor care what happened to this property so long as the bank did not have to handle it. The general manager of the bank explains to me that he did not think it good business for the bank to, so to speak, soil its hands by accepting, even notionally, any property of a testator which was not deliberately left to it. Why it should not have accepted it in those circumstances, I do not really understand. A

The question, however, which I have to decide is whether this document operates either as a severance of the joint tenancy and putting back into the estate, as property undisposed of, a third share in these various interests, or whether it is a release of the bank's share in those particular items of property which go in the ordinary way to the other joint tenants. Learned counsel have told me that there is very little authority, and I am not surprised, because this is not a document which ought to be adopted as a precedent. B
The question whether there can be a disclaimer in the proper sense by one of several joint tenants is one to which some attention has been paid, and in HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, Hailsham ed., vol. 34, p. 124, para. 158, I C find this statement:

"A disclaimer puts a donee, as regards his liabilities, burdens, and rights, in the same position as if no gift had been made to him, but does not necessarily render the gift void in regard to all persons and for all purposes, as, for example, where the donee is a trustee."

I do not believe that disclaimer can be made by one of several joint tenants because I think the unity of the estate and of the interest in the estate enures for the benefit of each and all and that each and all have one undivided and indivisible property in the subject-matter of the gift, just as, although for other reasons, one trustee cannot disclaim. I think that the only disclaimer which can be made by joint tenants is a disclaimer which is made by them all. D
The case to which counsel for the Custodian of Enemy Property has referred me, Re Wilks (1), seems to me to contain some statement as to how to sever a joint tenancy in the ordinary way, and it may be that, if there had been a definite severance of the joint tenancy before the deed or so-called disclaimer was executed, the position would have been very different, but there is no evidence of such a severance, and I think that all three parties, described in the deed as the bank and the beneficiaries, were together joint tenants. E
It is a little significant that the joint beneficiaries, named as of the other part, did not execute the deed. F
The only execution of the deed was by the bank.

I think that this document, which obviously, having regard to the prefatory recital, the bank thought was going to be a release, operated as a release to the other two joint tenants, and I should have thought that the bank would have been well pleased that that should be so because those two joint tenants are morally bound to carry out certain express desires and wishes of the testator. G
Why the bank felt that it was in some way precluded from helping them to carry out that moral duty, I do not understand, but it may be that, if there had been the slightest breath of suspicion that the bank had been helping itself to property that it did not consider itself entitled to, that would do harm to its reputation. I think that the effect of the deed was to confer on the first two defendants the whole of the interest declared in the order of COHEN, J., H to be vested in them and the bank as joint tenants, and I shall so declare.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 26, 27, November 3, 1950.]

Will—Condition—Forfeiture—Restraint of marriage—Motive—Construction of words of futurity.

A By her will, made on Feb. 28, 1935, the testatrix gave the income of her residuary estate on trust, subject to her sister's life interest therein, for her brother for life, and "at the death of the survivor of them, in case he shall not have married," the capital and income were to be paid to the brother's personal representative. She then directed that "in case he shall have married," the income of the residue was to be paid to her manservant during his life and after his death the capital and income were to be paid to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being of the parish church to be expended by them on the fabric of the church. On Apr. 3, 1935, the brother, who was living in the same house as the testatrix at the date of the will, married U.M., who was also living in that house at the time. The testatrix died on Mar. 8, 1938, and the sister died on Oct. 26, 1948. After the sister's death the brother claimed that he was entitled to the capital of the residue by combining his life interest with the gift to his personal representative, as the condition attached to the gift to his personal representative was void.

D HELD: (i) there was no sufficient context in the will of the testatrix to render inapplicable the rule that, prima facie, words of futurity in a will speak from the date of the will, and, therefore, the words "in case he shall have married" referred, not merely to the marriage of the brother after the death of the testatrix, but also to marriage after the date of the will and before the death of the testatrix.

Re Chapman ([1904] 1 Ch. 431), applied.

E (ii) on the true construction of the will, the testatrix, in attaching the condition to the gift to the brother's personal representative, had not intended to restrain the brother from marrying, but merely wished to ensure that after his death her residue would be dealt with in a particular manner, and, therefore, the condition was valid, and the gifts over would take effect after the brother's death.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and in the events which had happened, a condition attached to a gift was valid, or whether it was void as being in general restraint of marriage.

By her will the testatrix gave her residuary estate, subject to the life interests therein of her sister and brother, to the brother's personal representative if the brother "shall not have married," with gifts over "in case he shall have married." The brother married soon after the date of the will and before the death of the testatrix. After the death of the sister the brother claimed that he was entitled to the capital of the residue by combining his life interest with the gift to his personal representative. It was contended on his behalf that the condition attached to the gift to his personal representative was a condition subsequent and, its object being to restrain him from marrying, it was void as being contrary to public policy, and, therefore, the gift took effect free from the condition. On behalf of the next of kin it was contended that the condition was a condition precedent and, therefore, as performance of the condition had become impossible before the will took effect, the gift failed and there was an intestacy after the brother's death. The persons entitled under the gifts over contended that the object of the condition was not to restrain the brother from marrying, but merely to dispose of the property in a particular manner, and, therefore, the condition was good. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. HARMAN, J.: The testatrix, Ann Hattersley Fentem, was a spinster living at Dagnall, in the parish of Bakewell in Derbyshire. When she made her will on Feb. 28, 1935, she was living in a house with her sister, Mary Margaret Brown Fentem, also a spinster, and a brother, Thomas Fentem, who is the first defendant to this summons. He also was unmarried. There was also living in the house another spinster, Ursula Mather. The testatrix had a modest fortune to dispose of and, after appointing the plaintiff and her sister to be her executors and trustees, she gave all her property to her trustees on trust for sale and conversion in the usual way. She gave a small legacy to her professional executor, the plaintiff, and directed the investment of the balance of her residue and the payment of its income to her sister during her life, and, after the sister's death, to her brother, Thomas, during his life. She then continued in these words:

"... and at the death of the survivor of them, in case he [Thomas] shall not have married, I direct the capital and income of the said investments shall be paid to his legal personal representative, but in case he shall have married, I direct the said income shall be paid to John Bramwell, our man servant, during his life, and after his death the capital and income of the said investments shall be paid to the vicar and churchwardens for the time being, of the Bakewell parish church, to be expended by them upon the fabric of the church."

This clause has given rise to considerable difficulty. On Apr. 3, 1935, the brother married Miss Ursula Mather. One would suppose that the testatrix knew that that event was in contemplation when she made her will, but that is not a matter which I know with certainty. I shall assume that she knew of the marriage when it happened, because it was between her brother and a lady who were both living in the same house with her.

A The testatrix died on Mar. 8, 1938. Thereupon, in due course the estate was administered and the income of the investments representing the residue was paid to the sister until her death on Oct. 26, 1948, when it became payable to the brother during his life. The question arises what is to happen after the brother's death. Prima facie, that would be a future question, but the brother contends (and, in my judgment, rightly) that, if the gift over to his personal representative is a good gift, he is entitled to the capital now by combining his life interest with the gift to his personal representative. Counsel for the brother contended that the condition attached to the gift to his personal representative was a condition subsequent, and being (as he said) a condition in restraint of marriage, its object being to restrain or discourage him from marrying, was bad as being contrary to public policy, and, therefore, the gift to the brother's personal representative was not divested and remained a good gift. The brother could, therefore, give a good receipt for the capital of the fund. Counsel for the next of kin contended, on the other hand, that this was a condition precedent and, as performance of the condition had become impossible by the time the will came into force, because the marriage had already occurred before that date, the gift to the brother's personal representative fails, and there is an intestacy after the brother's life interest. Counsel for the persons entitled under the gifts over contends that this is not a condition in restraint of marriage, as it is the motive of the testatrix which counts, and, on a true construction of the will, the intention of the testatrix was not to restrain or deter the brother from marrying. Therefore, he contends the condition is good and must be given effect to, according to its tenor. He also advanced the argument that, as to the remainder to what he calls pious uses, viz., the gift to the vicar and churchwardens on a charitable trust, the court will never regard a condition as bad which leads to such pious uses in the end. For that proposition he cited a passage from the judgment of LORD THURLOW, L.C. (2 Dick. 722) in Scott v. Tyler (1):

E "It seems also agreed on all hands, that when, on any condition, however restrictive of marriage, the legacy is given over to pious uses, the intention of the party shall be deemed to regard those uses, and not to have aimed at the objectionable purpose of restraining marriage."

F In dealing with the problem which is now before me, I start with the principle that, when words of futurity are used in a will, prima facie they speak from the date of the will and not from the death of the testator, so that the words, "in case he shall not have married," prima facie refer to marriage after the date of the will and before the death of the testatrix, and not merely to marriage after the death of the testatrix: see Re Chapman (2), the headnote to which contains this sentence:

G "Though prima facie words of futurity in a will point to events happening after the execution of the will, and not merely to events happening after the testator's death, that prima facie meaning may be controlled by the context."

H The Court of Appeal, by a majority, held that there was enough in the context of the will in that case to show that a forfeiture clause operated only in the case of a marriage after the testator's death. COZENS-HARDY, L.J., dissented from that view, but agreed with the majority of the court in regard to the principle to be applied. He said ([1904] 1 Ch. 440):

"Although I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brethren as to the result of this appeal, I entirely agree as to the principles which ought to be applied. Prima facie a will speaks from the date of its execution, except as regards the property comprised in it, but there may be a context sufficient to show that this rule is not applicable. It is a matter of construction whether a particular clause is intended to speak and operate only from the death of the testator and not from the date of the execution of the will."

I find no sufficient context to enable me to say that the clause which we are now considering was meant to operate only from the death of the testatrix. She uses the words, "he shall have married," and that, I think, points to the period from the date of the will as well as later. Therefore, I cannot say that, as the marriage occurred during the lifetime of the testatrix, the condition does not, on its true construction, operate.

Secondly, it was, I think, agreed by all parties, that conditions in restraint of marriage, if general, are at least prima facie void as being contrary to public policy. There is a learned discussion of the subject by YOUNGER, J., in Re Hewett (3), where a gift to an unmarried woman was cut down, in the event of her marriage, in favour of the testator's child by her. It was contended on her behalf that the condition was void, being a general restraint against marriage, but the learned judge came to the conclusion that the testator's motive was not to restrain the woman from marrying, but to provide for his natural son by her, and that that was a good and laudable motive. The headnote contains these words: "A condition subsequent in restraint of marriage is only prima facie, and not per se, void." I do not think I need read a great deal of the judgment, because there is no doubt about the principle. The learned judge cited ([1918] 1 Ch. 463) a passage from the judgment of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Bellairs v. Bellairs (4), where the Master of the Rolls, who evidently disliked the principle, but felt bound to follow it, used these words (L.R. 18 Eq. 513):

"In the present case the law is settled thus far, that a general condition prohibiting marriage, by which a legacy is cut down, is void. I consider that to be the law of the courts of equity."

In Re Lanyon (5) RUSSELL, J., came to the conclusion that a condition, which was not, on the face of it, in general restraint of marriage, but which was a deterrent to marriage because the person subject to it could never know whether he could safely marry anyone, was also bad. Re Lanyon (5) is also germane to the present purpose in that there, too, the condition operated, not on the life interest of the person who was not to marry, but only on the interests which his children might take. The testator in that case gave his residuary estate to his trustees on trust to pay the income to his son, J.L., for his life, and on his decease on trust to pay the capital to his child or children and equally between them if more than one,

"... provided he does not marry a relation by blood, as I wish to mark my great objection to marriage between blood relations ..."

There were then certain other trusts in the event of the son marrying a blood relation. Therefore, the son lost nothing himself, but his children, if he had any, would be deprived of their interest if the person whom he married turned out to be a blood relation. The learned judge felt that the testator's son could never tell whom he could marry. He said ([1927] 2 Ch. 274):

"Looking to the case before me the restraint is in terms partial; although no one could say how large or small a portion of the female world is left open to choice, it is still in terms a partial restraint. But its nature is undoubtedly such that it would be difficult, almost impossible, to ascertain definitely that any particular lady was not a blood relation—that a Pevensy Bay or even more remote common ancestor could not be found. No marriage with a supposed stranger in blood could be contracted except subject to the risk that should a common ancestor be traced the provision for defeasance would operate. The son could only be certain that he was marrying a blood relation, he could never be certain that he was not. A provision which by its nature produces those results is in my opinion a provision leading to the probable prohibition of marriage and is void accordingly. There is one novel feature in this case—namely, that the penalty is inflicted not on the son who violates the provision but upon his children. No property is taken away from the son. In my opinion this makes no difference. It might well be that a provision taking away property from A. in the event of a breach of condition by B., would not operate in terrorem as regards B., if A. were a stranger. But I am clearly of opinion that where the victims are B.'s children, and the prohibited event is B.'s marriage, there is complete scope for operation in terrorem as regards B."

It seems to me that those last words are pertinent here. Although the brother's children are not the victims, the brother's personal representative is deprived of the right to dispose of the property, and, therefore, it seems to me that there is room for the words to operate in terrorem.

Counsel for the brother and counsel for the next of kin, who attack the condition, do so, of course, from different standpoints. Counsel for the brother contends that the condition is bad and, therefore, goes, and the gift is left. Counsel for the next of kin, on the other hand, contends that the condition is precedent, and, therefore, when it goes, the gift dependent on it goes too, and an intestacy supervenes. The difference between the two kinds of condition was discussed in Davis v. Angel (6), where SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., said (31 Beav. 226):

"This is, in fact, the plain and ordinary distinction between conditions precedent and conditions subsequent. If the condition be precedent and the performance of it become impossible, the estate or interest never vests, and the devisee or legatee takes nothing. But if the condition be subsequent and the performance of it becomes impossible, then the estate does not divest or go over to any other person, by reason of the non-performance of that condition. So also the consent of the person who imposed the condition will remove the consequence of the non-performance of the condition subsequent, and this, I think, was the view which the Vice-Chancellor took in the case of Smith v. Cowdery (7), and the other cases of that description which were cited and commented upon in the argument of this case. But no such consent will alter the effect of the devise or bequest, which makes the performance of the condition necessary before any interest is taken by the intended devisee or legatee. The consent of the testator, in the case of a condition subsequent, has the effect of revoking that part of his will, which gives the estate over to another person on the non-performance of the condition . . ."

Points of great nicety have been argued in a number of cases on the question whether a condition is or is not precedent, but I think that I must first consider the condition itself without regard to that consideration. Re Hewett (3) shows that, in the view of YOUNGER, J., motive was a material matter to consider. As an authority for his view, YOUNGER, J., cited ([1918] 1 Ch. 467) a passage from the judgment of BLACKBURN, J., in Jones v. Jones (8), which was a decision of a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division on an appeal from a county court in a replevin suit. It was necessary for the court to decide whether the motive in taking away a gift of property from a girl, called Mary Davies, was to prevent her marriage, so that the defeasance was bad. BLACKBURN, J., said (1 Q.B.D. 282):

"A number of cases have been referred to, from which it appears that the courts of equity have adopted from the ecclesiastical or civil law, it is unnecessary to say to what extent, the rule that conditions in general restraint of marriage are invalid. The attempt to escape from the consequences of this rule led to decisions in which a great many nice distinctions were established, as to whether the bequest amounted to a condition or only to a limitation."

He then said that he was dealing with a devise of land to which that last consideration did not apply, and he continued (ibid.):

"There is, I admit, strong authority, that when the object of the will is to restrain marriage and to promote celibacy, the courts will hold such a condition to be contrary to public policy and void. But here there appears to be no intention to promote celibacy. The testator leaves all his real estate, together with all his goods and chattels, to three women, his relations, during their lifetime; and he then proceeds: 'And when any or some of the before-mentioned parties named, Mary my sister, Elizabeth her daughter, or Sarah, the daughter of the said David Jones, shall depart this life, I give, devise, and bequeath her or their shares to be possessed and enjoyed by my sister Jemima, the wife of John Davies, together with her daughter Mary, during their lifetime: Provided the said Mary, daughter of the said Jemima, my sister, shall remain in her present state of single woman, otherwise, if she shall alter her present state of single woman, and bind herself in wedlock, she is liable to lose her share of the said property immediately, and her share to be possessed and enjoyed by the other mentioned parties share and share alike.' Now here, I think, when one sees the scope of the testator's dispositions, it comes to this: 'I have left to three women enough to live upon, and if one of them dies I bring in Jemima and Mary. But if Mary' (I suppose as the youngest she was most likely to change her state) 'happens to marry, her husband must maintain her, and her share shall pass to the rest.' Now, if he had said this in express words, could it have been contended that his provision was contrary to public policy? I think not. It is admitted that a limitation to Mary until she marries is perfectly good, but it is said that here, because the disposition is in the form of a condition, it is bad."

The learned judge then said that that consideration did not apply to real estate, and he continued (ibid., 283):

"... I think that, looking at the object of this will, and the fact that the testator probably thought that his property was not more than enough for these women to live upon together, his direction that the one who married should lose her share, cannot be said to be opposed to public policy."

LUSH, J., concurred in that opinion.

What, then, was the motive or the object of the testatrix when she made this rather strange bequest? She, her sister and the brother were all living in the same house with Ursula Mather, whom the brother married soon after the date of the will. She seems to have felt that it would be right that her sister should enjoy the income of her residue and that the brother should enjoy it after the sister's death, and she was, apparently, quite content that, if he were not married, he should have the disposition of it. One cannot suppose that she knew that, if she left it to his personal representative, the brother might take the capital. Her intention clearly was that he should, if he remained a bachelor, have a life interest with a remainder as he should choose to dispose of it. She may have had some arrangement with him, or she may have thought that she could trust him to do the best with it, but it then occurred to her—or, perhaps, she strongly suspected—that he was minded to marry. She must have known that there are other calls on the generosity or bounty of a married man than a local charity—it may be his widow, or his children. She came to the conclusion that, if the brother married, he would not be free to dispose of the property in the way which she wished and which, perhaps, he had agreed to. She, therefore, says: "If he shall have married, then he shall not have the disposition of it, but it shall go to our servant and then to the vicar and churchwardens of the parish church." In my judgment, the condition was not inserted with the motive of preventing the brother marrying. It did not punish him in any way. The testatrix merely provided that, if he did marry, then she, and not he, would dispose of the remainder. I may add that the condition clearly could not have operated to prevent him marrying, because he married before the will became an effective document. It could have no deterrent effect, but that I disregard, because, if the object was one of which the law disapproves, the condition might, nevertheless, be bad.

Having come to the conclusion that the condition was not intended to restrain the brother from marrying, I do not think I need decide whether, if it had been a bad condition, it was subsequent or precedent, nor need I decide the point in regard to the remainder being for pious uses. In my judgment, counsel for the brother and counsel for the next of kin do not make out their case, because they fail to persuade me that the motive or object of this condition was to restrain marriage. Therefore, I regard the condition as good and the remainder as well given. The brother, therefore, will continue to receive the income and it will go over after his death as the will directs.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties, as between solicitor and client, to be paid out of the corpus of the fund.

LANGFORD PROPERTY CO., LTD. v. BATTEN.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Goddard, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey and Lord Radcliffe), July 7, 11, 12, November 16, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Premises let with dwelling-house—House let on Sept. 1, 1939—Subsequent letting of house and separate garage—Treatment of garage as part of dwelling-house—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (3).

On Sept. 1, 1939, a flat, which came within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, was let at a rent of £135 a year, and a garage in the vicinity of the flat, but not contiguous thereto, was let to a different tenant at a rent of £13 a year. The flat occupied an area of six hundred to seven hundred square feet and the garage an area of 140 to 150 square feet. On Jan. 16, 1946, the flat and the garage were let by a single lease to a tenant for a period of three years at a rent of £175 rising to £185 a year, the lease providing that the premises let were entire and indivisible. At the end of the term the tenant held over as a statutory tenant. In proceedings to determine the standard rent of the premises, HELD (LORD GODDARD dissenting): although, under s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, the garage was to be treated as part of the flat with which it was let for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts, as the flat and garage together differed substantially from the the flat alone, the premises which were let in 1946 (viz., the flat and garage together) were a different entity from the premises let in 1939 (viz., the flat alone), and, therefore, the flat and garage constituted a dwelling-house which was first let on Jan. 16, 1946, and the standard rent was £185 a year.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of the Court of Appeal (BUCKNILL, COHEN and ASQUITH, L.JJ.), dated July 21, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 422, affirming an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Croydon County Court on Mar. 4, 1949.

On a summons taken out by the landlords for the determination of the standard rent of premises comprising a flat and a garage which were let to the tenant by a lease dated Jan. 16, 1946, the county court judge held that under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (3), the garage (which had not been previously let with the flat) was to be treated as part of the flat and the standard rent of the premises was the rent at which the flat alone was let in September, 1939. The landlords' appeal from this decision was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

Sir Arthur S. Comyns Carr, K.C., Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and Plume for the landlords.

Vester and R. E. Megarry for the tenant.

The House took time for consideration.

Nov. 16. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this case raises once again a question on the construction of the difficult and elusive wording of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Whether it will ever be possible to consolidate and re-draft their provisions I do not know, but the difficulty to which their language gives rise undoubtedly calls for their re-consideration.

In the present instance the appellants, who own a large block of flats known as The Woodlands, Beulah Hill, S.E.19, took out a summons in the Croydon County Court on Jan. 29, 1949, asking that the standard rent of Flat No. 2 and garage No. 7, which were then occupied by the respondent, might be determined by that court, claiming as landlords that the rent was £185 per annum, whereas the tenant contended that it was £135 only. On the trial of the summons the learned county court judge found for the respondent and the Court of Appeal upheld his judgment.

The facts as found by the county court judge have been tabulated in the Cases of the parties and are not in dispute. He found [according to the facts as set out in the landlords' Case]:

- "(a) That Flat No. 2 was not controlled by the Rent Acts before Sept. 1, 1939, but became controlled by the [Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939]. (b) That on Sept. 1, 1939, Flat No. 2 was let alone as a flat, and garage No. 7 existed as a garage with a rateable value of £6 per annum and was not let with Flat No. 2. (c) That garage, No. 7, had been added to Flat No. 2, and by the lease of Jan. 16, 1946, the [landlords] had let to the [tenant] the premises comprising garage No. 7 with Flat No. 2 as entire and indivisible. (d) That such addition of the garage No. 7 was totally unconnected with any structural alterations to or improvements of the original dwelling-house constituted by the letting of Flat No. 2 alone without the garage. (e) That the inclusion of the garage No. 7 in the letting of Flat No. 2 does not represent a trifling accession to the flat, that the flat occupies from six to seven hundred square feet and the garage an area of 140 to 150 square feet, and that the garage was let in 1939 at a rent of £13 per annum and had a rateable value of £6 per annum. (f) That, were it a pure question of fact, it would seem difficult to say that a flat plus a garage is the same thing as a flat without a garage, and that, on this assumption, i.e., that there has been a change of identity, the standard rent of the premises comprising Flat No. 2 and garage No. 7 would be fixed at £185 per annum as the rent under the first letting after Sept. 1, 1939, of the new dwelling-house, i.e., the flat plus garage, and not at £135, the rent under the letting of the flat alone on Sept. 1, 1939."

The county court judge also found [as set out in the tenant's Case]:

"That at the end of the war the [landlords] adopted a policy of compelling prospective tenants of flats to accept the inclusion of a garage in the demised premises whether the tenants needed or desired the garage or not, for the purpose of establishing, if possible, an increased standard rent in respect of their flats."

As stated in the landlords' Case, the learned county court judge went on to express the opinion that:

"(g) The view that the content of the new tenancy of the flat plus garage is not identical with the content of the tenancy of the flat alone without garage is supported by the decisions in the Court of Appeal in R. & P. Properties, Ltd. v. Baldwin (1) and Vaughan v. Shaw (2). (h) That, as a matter of law, by applying the provisions of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 to the fact that garage No. 7 is let with Flat No. 2, the garage is therefore to be treated as part of the flat and that it is notionally part of the flat, and its accession to the flat cannot alter the standard rent of the flat as fixed by the letting of the flat alone in September, 1939, and that this literal interpretation of the statute was acted upon in Hemms v. Wheeler (3), where the analogous provisions of s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, were considered. (i) That for the reasons given in para. (h) the standard rent of £135 of Flat No. 2, fixed by the letting in September, 1939, of Flat No. 2 alone, was also the standard rent of the premises comprised in the letting of Flat No. 2 plus garage No. 7."

The flat alone was let at a rent of £135 per annum on Sept. 1, 1939, and was then rated at £56, and, accordingly, it came under the control of the provisions contained in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. It became vacant shortly before Jan. 16, 1946, and was then leased to the tenant with a garage at a rent of £175 rising to £185, for a term of three years beginning on Feb. 1 of that year. If, then, the standard rent is to be calculated on the rent payable for the flat alone on Sept. 1, 1939, it is limited to £135. If, on the other hand, Jan. 16, 1946, is the appropriate date and the composite entity of flat and garage is considered to have then been let for the first time, it is £185. Clause 13 of the lease of Jan. 16, 1946, contained the provision:

"It is hereby mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said premises are entire and indivisible and in the event of the tenancy hereby created being continued after the expiration of the term or of the tenant remaining in possession by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts or other statutory power any such extension shall be on the terms and condition that the said premises are entire and indivisible."

Whether the standard rent is to be fixed at £135 or at £185, the premises are admittedly within the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and at the expiry of his lease the tenant was entitled to and did hold over as a statutory tenant.

The sole question for your Lordships is whether the standard rent is £135 or £185, but the matter is of some importance to the landlords, as they have let at least six flats with garages to which similar considerations apply, and it may also affect a large number of prospective tenants of this and similar blocks of flats who may be compelled to pay an increased standard rent to obtain the accommodation which they require. A flat with a garage is, as the landlords maintain, a different entity from a flat without a garage, and, therefore, if the Acts contained no special provision dealing with the matter, the tenant's contention is wrong. But, says the tenant, the Acts have specifically provided for such an incident, first in s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 and now in s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. The matter, however, had already been dealt with in s. 2 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (War Restrictions) Act, 1915, which has now been repealed by the Act of 1920, but, as I think, has some bearing on the history and development of the principles and meaning of the Acts, and I set out each of the three sub-sections in the belief that they may be of assistance to your Lordships in reaching a conclusion as to their true construction.

Section 2 (2) of the Act of 1915 provides:

"This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling where such letting does not include any land other than the site of the dwelling-house and a garden or other premises within the curtilage of the dwelling-house . . ."

Section 12 (2) (iii) of the Act of 1920 provides:

"For the purposes of this Act, any land or premises let together with a house shall, if the rateable value of the land or premises let separately would be less than one quarter of the rateable value of the house, be treated as part of the house, but, subject to this provision, this Act shall not apply to a house let together with land other than the site of the house."

Section 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 provides:

"Subject to the provisions of para. (a) of the last preceding sub-section, the application of the principal Acts, by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes; and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920-1938, as amended by virtue of this section, any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house; but, save as aforesaid, the principal Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply to any dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house."

My Lords, as I see it, s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1915 was concerned only with defining what was included in the term "dwelling-house" for the purpose of that Act. If the letting embraced more than the garden or curtilage of the dwelling-house, it was not subject to the mischief of the Act. If more was let, the premises were not the subject of control. That Act was not dealing with a case where some addition was made to the premises which were let—indeed, if the house came into the landlord's hands and was re-let as one entity with a portion of land which comprised more than a garden or curtilage, it was no longer subject to the provisions of the Act. When, in 1920, the question of what restrictions were to be imposed on landlords against increasing the rent of houses let at or below a prescribed figure again arose, it appears to have been found that the definition of "dwelling-house" was too narrowly drawn, and that expression was, therefore, extended to include, not only the curtilage, but any land let with the house provided its rateable value was not more than one-quarter

A of the rateable value of the house with which it was let. Again, however, the sub-section, in my view, was not framed to deal with a case where the extent of the land let with the house was subsequently increased to a substantial extent. It was only enacted for the purpose of determining whether the premises as originally let consisted of a house together with land of less value than a quarter of the house's value or whether the land so let was of greater value. In the former case the premises were a dwelling-house within the meaning attributed to that expression by the Act: in the latter case they were not.

B The Act of 1939 was, in general, an enlargement in scope of the premises to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and it extended the time during which they were to remain in force. The definition of a dwelling-house contained in the former Acts was felt to exclude premises which should be included and s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 was enacted to widen the protection given. Under that sub-section any land (except a certain quantity of agricultural land, which is immaterial to the question at issue) let with the dwelling-house forms part of the dwelling-house and the only question is whether the rateable value of the combined entity is less than or exceeds the figures prescribed in s. 3 (1) of the Act. Section 3 (2), it is true, excludes certain premises from the control of the Act even if their value is less than the stipulated figure, but, to my mind, has C no further bearing on the topic under discussion. If, then, a house is let together with any quantity of land and the total rateable value is under the figure prescribed for the locality in which it is situated, the house and land are within the mischief of the Acts. If, however, a house of a less value than the prescribed limit is let alone, and afterwards possession is recovered and the house is subsequently let with the addition of a piece of land of substantial rateable value, D it does not follow that it remains the same dwelling-house, even though the total rateable value of house and land is less than £75. For example, suppose a house rated at £30 is let to one tenant but is afterwards handed back to the landlords and is thereafter let to another tenant together with land rated at £45, the provisions of s. 3 (3) do not, in my opinion, necessarily constitute the house and land the same dwelling-house as the premises originally let. Land let with the dwelling-house, it is true, must be treated as part of the dwelling-house with E which it is let, but this does not mean that a house and land are the same thing as the house without the land. To my mind, the provision is a protection for the landlord as well as the tenant, since it prevents the latter from demanding that the rateable value of house and land should be separated one from the other and claiming that, if the proportion attributed to the house is less than the F prescribed figure, the house is a protected dwelling though the rateable value of the total premises let far exceeds that figure. Whether the subject-matter of the new letting is to be regarded as the same entity as that of the old is a question for the county court judge.

G I would only add that there must be a substantial change between the premises formerly let and those subsequently the subject of a letting. A mere small or incidental change is not enough. In the present instance, however, the learned county court judge has said:

H "Although I felt impelled to decide in the tenant's favour for reasons which I shall state later, it is only right to say that I am satisfied that the inclusion in each tenancy of a garage does not represent a trifling accession to the flat. Each flat occupies from six to seven hundred square feet. The garages were let independently in 1939 at rents varying between £19 10s. and £10. They were and are still separately rated at £6 a year, and they occupy areas of 140 to 150 square feet in each case. Certainly, at first impression it would seem difficult to say—were it a pure question of fact, that a flat plus garage is the same thing as a flat without a garage."

This, in my view, is a finding that the new premises let differ substantially from the old and, so differing, are not the same entity. The conclusion follows, on my interpretation of the Acts, that the flat and garage constitute a dwelling-house which differs from the flat alone and was first let on Jan. 16, 1946, and the standard rent is £185 per annum.

Like BUCKNILL, L.J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 427), I find some difficulty in reconciling the reasoning of the court in Vaughan v. Shaw (2) with that in Hemms v. Wheeler (3), though, unlike him, I prefer the reasoning in the former case. Actually, however, I doubt whether the decision reached in either case is at variance with the view I have expressed. Vaughan's case (2), obviously, is not, and it might well be held in Hemms' case (3) that there had been no substantial change of entity. As TUCKER, L.J., said ([1948] 2 K.B. 66) in Hemms' case (3):

"I think that the policy of the Acts is, in effect, to ignore the existence of these small plots of land and added premises in ascertaining what is the dwelling-house."

The result of that case, therefore, might be unchanged even if the opinion which I have expressed had been followed, though, no doubt, the reasoning by which that result was reached was arrived at on the ground, which I do not accept, that no addition to the premises originally let took the dwelling-house outside the protection of the Acts unless the total rateable value exceeded the prescribed limit.

As I view it, Haldane v. Sinclair (4), was rightly decided and took the correct view of the object and effect of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920, an object and purpose which have not been altered by the change of wording adopted in s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. It is true that that decision dealt with the question whether a letting with land of a value greater than one-quarter of the value of the dwelling-house, following a letting of the same dwelling-house with land of less value than one-quarter of the dwelling-house, altered the position so that the later letting was free from the control of the Acts, but the reason given for the decision was that this letting had altered the identity of the house. If the argument of the tenant in the case now before us is right, I find difficulty in seeing that the fact that the rateable value of the totality let on the second occasion [in Haldane v. Sinclair (4)] exceeded the limits prescribed by the Acts can make any difference. The dwelling, as he contends, is still the same dwelling and the added premises are to be treated as part of it and will still be subject to the Act. If this is the true view, it must, I think, logically follow that, however large the addition, the premises with the additional land remain the same dwelling-house and have the same standard rent as the house alone. This difficulty is avoided if the question in each case is: "Is it the same entity as that originally let or have the additional premises substantially altered it?"

In the course of the argument before your Lordships' House many cases decided on the terms of this difficult and controversial section and its predecessors were quoted, but those to which I have referred are, I think, sufficient to illustrate the differences of view which have been held and the reasons for the construction which, in my opinion, the section bears. I was at one time somewhat influenced by the fear that such a construction might take from tenants the protection which the Act was passed to afford, but I have come to the conclusion that, provided a sufficiently substantial change of identity is required, no such consequence will follow. In any event, I think that the true construction of the Acts is that which I have indicated and I would allow the appeal.

LORD GODDARD [read by LORD PORTER]: My Lords, in my opinion, the construction placed by the Court of Appeal on s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 was right. Indeed, I think that this is the very class of transaction which the subsection was intended to deal with and prevent, that is to say, one in which a landlord obliges a prospective tenant of a dwelling-house, hitherto subject to a controlled rent, to take with it something for which he has neither use nor desire, the object being to extricate the house from the operation of the Rent Restriction tions Acts. As, however, the rest of your Lordships are of a different opinion, it would serve no useful purpose to burden the law reports, already congested with decisions on these difficult and obscurely worded Acts, by expressing my dissent at length, and I, accordingly, say no more than that I would dismiss the appeal.

A LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I agree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and also with the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD RADCLIFFE, which I have had the advantage of reading in print. To these opinions I cannot usefully add anything.

B LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree with the motion proposed. The question appears to me to depend on the construction of the expressions "standard rent" and "dwelling-house" in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, and the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. The expression dwelling-house means a house
C "let as a separate dwelling" and includes not only the house itself and its site but "any land or premises let together with" it "unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent." I would refer on this matter to the judgment of the Lord President (LORD CLYDE) in Haldane v. Sinclair (4), with which I respectfully agree. The dwelling-house, the standard rent of which has to be determined in the present case, therefore, included not only the flat but the garage, and the question is: When was that dwelling-house first let? To that there can, in my opinion, only be one answer, that it was first let on Jan. 16, 1946. It is argued, and has been held by the Court of Appeal, that the effect of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939, which
D provides that land or premises let together with a dwelling-house, unless they consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres, shall be treated as part of the dwelling-house, has the effect of making the dwelling-house let in 1946 the same dwelling-house as was let in 1939. In my opinion, this sub-section and the corresponding sub-section in the Act of 1920, viz., s. 12 (2) (iii), define the extent of dwelling-houses to which the Act applies, but do not, and cannot in the
E absence of explicit language, make one dwelling-house of one extent let at one time the same as another dwelling-house of a different extent let at a different time. It has been suggested that this construction will enable landlords to evade the Rent Restrictions Acts by adding small pieces of land or premises to houses to which a standard rent has already attached, but I do not think that
F this possibility is a sufficient reason for adopting a construction which, in my opinion, is not the true meaning of the words used. Moreover, I think that it may very well be that it is a question of fact whether the dwelling-houses let are, in fact, different. In the present case the learned county court judge appears to have found as a fact that they were different, and, in my opinion, he could not have found anything else on the evidence. I see no sound distinction between
G cases such as Veale v. Cabezas (5), R. & P. Properties, Ltd. v. Baldwin (1), and Vaughan v. Shaw (2), and the present case. The dwelling-house let is the dwelling-house contracted to be let and all the parcels that that contract contains. To say that the garage in the present case is no part of the dwelling-house let seems to me to contradict the words in the Acts which say what is deemed to be the dwelling-house let and to be treated as part of that dwelling-house.

H LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I, too, agree with the motion proposed. This is a case about standard rent under the Rent Restrictions Acts. The Court of Appeal have held that the standard rent of a flat which has a garage let with it is bound to be the same as the rent paid for that flat on Sept. 1, 1939, when it was let without the garage. If that is right, the addition to the letting of a substantial item of property counts for nothing in the ascertainment of the standard rent of the whole subject so let. If the Acts require that, there is nothing more to be said, but, as a general proposition, this conclusion seems to me to be contrary to common sense and to be unfair to the landlords, and, although we were warned by counsel against the folly of supposing that any construction of these Acts could escape the recognition of anomalies, I do not wish to start by going to the other extreme and by inferring that, because a particular construction leads to an anomaly, we have by that very fact an indication that the Acts have been correctly interpreted. The crucial words are those contained in s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. But, although those are the crucial words, the crucial question seems to me to be not so much what they mean as how they are to be applied to the ascertainment of standard rent in accordance with s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, as modified in respect of the relevant date by the provisions of sched. I to the Act of 1939. I have great difficulty in seeing how there can be any room for substantial controversy as to what the words mean. On the other hand, I am very conscious how little easy it is to be certain what is the right way of applying them when it comes to the question of ascertaining a standard rent.

First, then, as to what they mean. I think that the significance of this part of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 can best be understood if one goes back to s. 12 of the Act of 1920 in which the words previously appeared. There are, of course, changes in the wording and arrangement in the later Act, but the changes are not due to any circumstance that bears on the present purpose and I have no doubt that the general meaning and effect of the material words in the Act of 1939 are the same as in the earlier Act. Now s. 12 of the Act of 1920 is a section entitled "Application and interpretation," and it is plain that, while sub-s. (1) is devoted to supplying interpretations or definitions of phrases employed in the Act, sub-s. (2) has as its function to declare to what subjects and under what conditions the Act is to apply. Sub-section (2) opens by stating that the Act is to apply to every "house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling," if within the specified limits of rateable value, and it closes by stating, in proviso (iii), that subject to what is provided by that proviso, the Act shall "not apply to a house let together with land other than the site of the house." The basic thing, therefore, which is protected is the structure forming a house or part of a house and the site that it occupies. If something beyond that is also to come within the protection of the Act, it must be brought within it by the operation of some positive enactment to be found between the beginning and the end of sub-s. (2). Similarly, if a structure which would be protected if let by itself is included in a letting which comprises land other than the site of the structure or premises other than the structure itself, sub-s. (2) must make plain whether the structure or the whole complex of property that is the subject of the tenancy is to be within or without the scope of the Act. The words at the beginning of proviso (iii) to s. 12 (2), seem to me designed to do, and in fact do, just what is required for the purpose that I have mentioned. They indicate that land or premises which are not intrinsically protected subjects are to be treated as part of a house which is a protected subject if they are let with it and if their rateable value does not exceed a certain proportion of the rateable value of the house. There results, for the purposes of the Act, a kind of house which is really an artificial conception created by the Act, for it is a house of which some land or premises are to be treated as a part. I think that TUCKER, L.J., accurately described the effect of these words when he said ([1948] 2 K.B. 66) in Hemms v. Wheeler (3): "This results in a notional dwelling-house consisting of bricks and mortar plus land." I can, however, find no warrant for taking the further step of interpreting the words as meaning that the notional dwelling-house so created is to be deemed to be the same dwelling-house as would be the house without the land. It is because the Court of Appeal have given just that meaning to the words of the sub-section that I do not find it possible to agree with their judgment. This provision has no special relevance to a case where land or premises, or more land or other premises, have been added to a dwelling-house which was previously a controlled house. It will apply to the tenancy so created, at any rate so long as, under s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939, the land is not more than two acres of agricultural land, but it is a mistake to regard it as designed to solve the difficulties created by a variation in the subject-matter of a tenancy. For the words are not apt to do so. Nor can I see on what foundation is based the observation of TUCKER, L.J. ([1948] 2 K.B. 66) in Hemms v. Wheeler (3) that

“... the policy of the Acts is, in effect, to ignore the existence of these small plots of land and added premises in ascertaining what is the dwelling-house.”

Since a belief in the existence of such a policy is of some importance to the tenant's argument, because it would at least make purposeful the otherwise purposeless anomaly which it supports, I must devote a moment to explaining why I do not entertain it.

My Lords, it is, perhaps, a little misleading to speak of “small plots of land” in this connection. It is not that one need strain the imagination with visions of the improbable contingency of a valuable factory being “let together with” a controlled house or by speculating what would happen if a large acreage of non-agricultural land were included in the letting of such a house. No doubt, the sort of thing that was contemplated was small in extent and of no great value—a garden, a courtyard, a shed, a garage, etc. But the legislature is dealing with these things in relation to other things that are also on a small scale, small dwellings, small tenants and often, though this is sometimes ignored, small landlords, to whom a difference of even a few shillings a week in rent is not a matter of no importance. I do not think that the mere smallness of the kind of property that was contemplated can itself give any clue to the intention of the Act. But how can it be said that the Act is so framed as to ignore the existence of such property? If on Sept. 1, 1939, land and premises, say a garden and shed, were let together with a dwelling-house and the rateable value of the whole unit on the appropriate day exceeded the statutory limit, it seems to me plain that every part of it would be unaffected by the Act, even though the dwelling-house, if a separate unit, would have a rateable value within the limit. In this case the presence of the land and premises makes an essential difference. Or take the case of standard rent. If the same house, garden and shed were within the rateable limit and were let on Sept. 1, 1939, the standard rent of that “dwelling-house” would be the rent then paid, not the less because part of it was attributable to the amenity provided by the shed and garden. Here, again, full value is given to the accessory in the operation of the Act. To ask whether, if the house were subsequently let without the shed and garden, its standard rent would still be as high as the former figure is only to pose in another form the question involved in the present appeal. The tenant's argument would seem to require that it would be, but, however that may be, there is no basis for any general conception that the Act is so constructed as to treat land or premises let with a dwelling-house as if they were an inconsiderable portion of that house.

I conclude, therefore, that, while s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 certainly applies to the garage which is let together with the flat in the case which we are now considering and while its effect is to oblige us to treat the garage as a part of the flat with which it is let for all the purposes of the Act, it is not expressed in terms which call for the assumption that the flat which is deemed to have the garage as a part of it is the same flat as that which previously had no such part. In particular, the sub-section is incapable of providing a statutory solution of the vexed question whether the “dwelling-house” the standard rent of which is now in issue was let on Sept. 1, 1939, or was first let on Jan. 16, 1946, when the tenant assumed the present tenancy. Indeed, to ask this question in the abstract is to raise a problem that belongs more to philosophy than to law. I do not, however, think that it can usefully be answered by treating it as a general question of continuing identity. The right answer must be found by such guides as the scheme of the Rent Restrictions Acts affords and by the marks that have been left by a settled course of judicial interpretation. So far as I can see, the Acts do not contain any explicit directions how to treat changes in the subject-matter of a tenancy which embraces a house within the Acts. Two main causes must be responsible if such changes come about. One is a physical change brought about by improvement or structural alteration of the premises. The other is an alteration of the subject-matter by including in a subsequent letting more than was previously let or, alternatively, by excluding some part formerly demised. In the first case I think it reasonably clear that the Acts do not regard mere improvement or structural alteration as effecting a change of identity for the purposes of standard rent. On the contrary, the provision of s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, which allows the landlord, by way of permitted increase of rent, a certain percentage on the amount of his expenditure on improvements or structural alteration, shows that for the purposes of s. 12 (1) (a) of the same Act the dwelling-house as improved or altered is regarded as the same dwelling-house as it was before. Some change more radical than the mere fact of improvement or structural alteration must take place before it can be said that, in effect, the dwelling-house which will then be under consideration has not been previously let. In the second case, however, I can find no pointer as to what is intended by the Acts. The gap has had to be filled by judicial interpretation. It might have been thought that the overriding purpose of these Acts was to invest each separate dwelling, which was brought within their protection at the commencing date with a special status incapable of surrender and to charge that dwelling with its existing rent as the permitted standard, regardless of whatever combinations of parcels might subsequently be effected by arrangements between landlord and tenant when new lettings took place. If such an interpretation of the general scheme of the Acts could have been extracted from them and could have been consistently applied by the courts, I am not persuaded that the result would have been unsatisfactory. Indeed, both s. 8 of the Act of 1920 and s. 9 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, were aimed at making it impossible for a landlord to do the same sort of thing as the landlord achieved in this case by making the tenant take the garage, which he did not want, with the flat, which he did. I am, however, bound to recognise that the courts have not approached the Acts in this way and have been ready to interpret a subsequent variation in the content of a tenancy as creating a new dwelling-house for the purposes of the Acts. I think that the decisions in Veale v. Cabezas (5), R. & P. Properties, Ltd. v. Baldwin (1) and Vaughan v. Shaw (2) are all based on the theory that the act of parties in arranging a new letting can "destroy" the entity of a dwelling-house a former letting of which had attracted a standard rent, and can create a new standard rent for the new entity which is the subject of the new letting.

If, then, there is no simple general rule that will provide the answer, I think that it is in substance a question of fact whether a dwelling-house, the standard rent of which is to be ascertained, is the same dwelling-house as one previously let. It would be all wrong, as it seems to me, to deduce a change of identity from some unimportant variation in the content of the tenancy. For the question is not so much whether the premises are in all respects the same as whether the dwelling-house now in question is the same dwelling-house as before. Trivial variations—a few feet here or there—ought not to be treated as causing a change. That argument, that any variation in the parcels demised must result in law in a new dwelling-house, was advanced on behalf of the landlord in Hemns v.

Wheeler (3) and was rightly rejected. I agree with what TUCKER, L.J., said ([1948] 2 K.B. 67):

“ . . . it is, in my view, erroneous to say that this dwelling-house was not let in August, 1914, merely because a piece of land has been added.”

A But then the word “merely” has significance. In this case, however, the county court judge has said that the addition of the garage to the flat is no trifling accession. I think that what he has said after that in his judgment is intended to convey that, were he to regard this as a pure question of fact, he would hold the flat with garage to be substantially a different dwelling-house from the flat alone. In fact, he had so held in similar circumstances in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Sommerfeld (6). Either view, a change of identity or the same dwelling-

B house, seems to me a possible one on the facts, but, if s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 does not have the effect of compelling the court to assume the continued identity, as I think that it does not, the county court judge’s views on a question of degree, as to which there is no absolute test, ought not to be departed from by an appellate court, if there is evidence to support them. Consequently, I think that the appeal should succeed.

C My Lords, we are warned that, if the landlords’ argument should succeed, much of the protection that standard rent affords to tenants of controlled houses will be lost. That is a serious consideration, although, if it were to influence our decision, we should only be allowing one injustice in order to avoid the possibility of another. On the whole, however, I think that the dangers anticipated may be somewhat exaggerated. Landlords may, indeed, find it possible in some cases

D to re-arrange the subjects of their tenancies so that the standard rent of what was previously let is no longer the standard rent of the new accommodation. There is, however, something rather unreal in visualising the typical landlord as a property-owner with a reserve stock of spare assets which he can add to his tenancies at will on future lettings. I doubt if a great many landlords could take advantage of such a device if they wanted to. Nor, as I see it, will it serve

E their purpose to make some trifling re-arrangement of the parcels. It is not the maxim de minimis which stands between continuing identity and a change of identity, but the fact that only a substantial variation in what is let can justify a finding that there is a new dwelling-house for the purposes of the Acts. Lastly, the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, has now brought it about that the standard rent in such a case will no longer be what the landlord may be

F able to extract from the tenant’s necessities, but will be such as the appropriate tribunal may allow. With all this in mind, I cannot think that success in this appeal will afford landlords as a class any but a minor source of gratification.

Appeal allowed. No order as to costs.

[DURHAM ASSIZES (Finnemore, J.), October 18, 1950.]

Local Government—Compensation to transferred officer—“Emoluments for which compensation granted”—Increases of salary in new employment—Power to review compensation—Local Government Act, 1929 (c. 17), s. 123; sched. VIII, para. 14.

The plaintiff was a road surveyor employed by a rural district council, and, on the delegation of powers in respect of roads to that council being determined by the defendant county council under s. 35 (7) of the Local Government Act, 1929, he was transferred to the county council and was employed by them as a divisional surveyor at a lower salary. He was, accordingly, entitled to, and was paid, compensation based on the difference between the two emoluments. When in the service of the county council he received yearly increases in his emoluments.

HELD: (i) the transfer of the plaintiff to the county council having been effected under s. 120 of the Act, on the true construction of para. 14 of sched. VIII to the Act the plaintiff's increases in the emoluments of his office under the county council were “by virtue of” something “done in pursuance of or in consequence of” the Act, and, therefore, his compensation could be diminished or suspended from time to time so that he should not receive any greater amount of compensation than with the emoluments of his office under the county council was equal to the emoluments in respect of which compensation had been granted.

(ii) the last-named emoluments must be taken to be the full amount of the plaintiff's emoluments at the time of his transfer and not the average of his emoluments for the previous five years which had been taken into account in assessing his compensation.

ACTION tried by FINNEMORE, J., at Durham Assizes.

Before Apr. 1, 1947, the plaintiff was employed by the Durham Rural District Council as a road surveyor. On Apr. 1, 1947, certain powers delegated to that council by the defendants, the Durham County Council, as highway authority, were determined by the defendants under s. 35 (7) of the Local Government Act, 1929. In consequence, the plaintiff's employment by the rural district council was determined and he was transferred to the service of the defendants as a divisional surveyor. The plaintiff's yearly salary immediately before his transfer was £728, but his average salary for the five years ending Mar. 31, 1947, was £706 15s. 2d. His salary in the service of the defendants as from Apr. 1, 1947, was £594 19s. 3d. The compensation payable to him under s. 123 (1) of the Act was fixed by the Minister of Health under para. 13 of sched. VIII to the Act at the rate of £67 1s. 9d., this sum being 36/60ths of the difference between the plaintiff's average salary for the previous five years and his new salary. The plaintiff's salary for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, was £685, and he was paid £43 compensation, and for the year ending Mar. 31, 1950, it was £710 and no compensation was paid. The plaintiff claimed £91 3s. 6d., being £24 1s. 9d. for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, in respect of compensation at the rate determined by the Minister less the sum of £43 paid, and £67 1s. 9d. for the year ending Mar. 31, 1950. The defendants contended (i) that the compensation for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, had been paid at the rate of £43 under a mistake of fact and should have been £21 15s. 2d. (the difference between the five years' average and the actual salary for that year), and they counterclaimed for the sum of £21 4s. 10d., and (ii) that no compensation was payable for the year ending Mar. 31, 1950.

M. L. Lyell for the plaintiff.

A J. Charlesworth for the defendants.

FINNEMORE, J., stated the facts and continued: The short point is this. The plaintiff says: "My compensation was fixed when I was transferred and nothing has happened since which has entitled the defendants to diminish or suspend it." The defendants say: "By virtue of sched. VIII, para. 14, of the Local Government Act, 1929, we are entitled to reduce or to suspend altogether the amount of compensation that is payable." The matter turns ultimately on the construction of the words of para. 14, but I ought first to refer to s. 123 (1) of the Act which thus provides for compensation:

C "Every person who having been an officer of an authority or committee from whom functions are transferred under this Act . . . on Nov. 12, 1928, is at the appointed day an officer of such an authority or committee . . . and who by virtue of this Act, or of anything done in pursuance or in consequence thereof, suffers any direct pecuniary loss by determination of his appointment, or by diminution or loss of fees, salary, or emoluments, and for whose compensation for that loss provision is not made by any other enactment for the time being in force, shall be entitled to compensation under this Act for that loss."

D That compensation has been settled between the parties by a decision of the Minister of Health on the appeal which was made to him, and that decision cannot be varied except in certain circumstances which are laid down in para. 14 of sched. VIII. Paragraph 1 of sched. VIII provides:

E "For the purpose of determining whether compensation is payable to an officer and, if so, the amount of such compensation, regard shall be had to . . . (d) any additional emoluments which he acquires by virtue of this Act, or of anything done in pursuance or in consequence of this Act . . ."

F The second appearance of that phrase, "anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act," in para. 14 of the schedule is the cause of the present action. Paragraph 14 provides:

G "If a person receiving compensation under this schedule is appointed to any office under the Crown or any local or other public authority, or by virtue of this Act, or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act, receives any increase of the emoluments of the office held by him, he shall not, while receiving the emoluments of that office, receive any greater amount of his compensation, if any, than with the emoluments of the said office, is equal to the emoluments for which compensation was granted to him, and if the emoluments of the office he holds are equal to or greater than the emoluments for which compensation was granted, his compensation shall be suspended while he holds that office."

H That seems to be a common sense provision. It would appear to me anomalous if a man should continue in the public service and be in receipt of the full amount, or even more than, he would have received if no transfer had taken place, and still be entitled to receive compensation, the whole purpose of which is to make up part of the pecuniary loss which he has suffered by the loss of his original appointment and his transfer under this Act. If he is appointed to an office under the Crown or an office under a local or other public authority, the compensation is reviewed in the light of his new salary. That is not in dispute, and no question relating to it arises in the present case. The second part of para. 14 deals with an increase in his emoluments. The words used are:

"If a person . . . by virtue of this Act, or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act, receives any increase of the emoluments of the office held by him . . ."

The argument of counsel for the plaintiff on the construction of that paragraph was that the increase in the emoluments of the office held by him must be either "by virtue of this Act, or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act," and, as the increase which the plaintiff received was not, directly at least, "by virtue of this Act or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act," the paragraph did not apply. In other words, nobody could point to anything in the Act and say: "Here is something which has led to and caused to be brought about this increase of the emoluments of the office held by the plaintiff." The argument of counsel for the defendants was based on a broader interpretation of this paragraph. He said that "by virtue of this Act," or of something "done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act," the plaintiff was transferred as a surveyor to the Durham County Council. Subsequently, he received in that office an increase of the emoluments paid to him, and, therefore, that increase was the result of something "done in pursuance of or in consequence of" the Act.

Taking it broadly, the distinction between the two arguments addressed to me is this. One is the narrower construction; the other is the broader construction. The question is: Which is the right one? I confess I find it difficult to see how the second limb of para. 14 could apply at all if it was necessary to point to something in the Act which authorises, or directly provides for, an increase in the emoluments of the officer. On the narrower construction it is somewhat difficult to know to what it does apply, or, indeed, to what it could apply. It is plain under the first part of the paragraph that, if an officer is appointed to another office in the public service, his compensation is reviewed. It would seem logical that, similarly, if his salary increases while he is in that office in the public service, then also the compensation ought to be reviewed. But that, of course, is not a reason for deciding against the plaintiff because the decision must depend on the construction of the Act. It is not a question of what ought to be done. It is not even a question of what one might imagine Parliament intended to do. It is a question of interpreting the words and trying to decide what they mean.

My attention has been directed to the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Bidie (1) about the general principle that should be applied—which I accept, i.e., that words must not be taken out of their context and given a certain meaning quite irrespective of the words with which they are connected. As LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1949] Ch. 130), it is necessary to read the statute as a whole and ask oneself the question:

"In this statute, in this context, relating to this subject-matter, what is the true meaning of that word?"

I have come to the conclusion, remembering that canon of construction, that what I call the broader interpretation is the correct one, so that when the plaintiff received the increase in the emoluments of his office he did receive an increase as the result of "something done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act," because it was through something done in pursuance of or in consequence of the Act that he had been transferred from the service of the Durham Rural District Council to the office which he now holds, in which office he has received the increase in emoluments.

There are two other points. I gather that counsel for the defendants does not press either of them very much, because a question of principle is raised which may affect a great many people. It is to be noted that the latter part of para. 14 does not only refer to compensation. It provides that, if a person receiving compensation receives any increase in the emoluments of the office held by him,

- A " . . . he shall not . . . receive any greater amount of his compensation, if any, than with the emoluments of the said office, is equal to the emoluments for which compensation was granted to him . . . "

The question is: What is that figure? Does "emoluments," when used the second time, mean the five years' average which was taken as the basis in assessing compensation, or does it mean the actual amount that he was receiving at the date when he was transferred? I think here again I would take what I call the broader view and say that he is entitled to have considered his full emoluments at the time he is transferred and not the average for the five years. In other words, in the present case I think that £728 would be the proper figure to take into account in dealing with the construction of this paragraph, and not the five years' average figure, £706 15s. 2d., which was the basis of compensation in general. With regard to the counterclaim, I think the defendants were prepared to concede (I should be inclined myself, in any event, to accept the view) that the mistake, whatever it was, was a mistake of law rather than of fact, and that, therefore, the money claimed under the counterclaim is not recoverable.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £18. Counterclaim dismissed. No order as to costs.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), November 10, 13, 1950.]

Carriage of Passengers—Injury to passenger—Defective paving near edge of platform—Breach of implied warranty that premises reasonably safe.

A railway season ticket holder, when about to board a train, caught his foot in a crack between a paving stone and one of the coping stones along the edge of the station platform belonging to the defendants, with the result that a bone in his foot was fractured.

HELD: although the question of access to the train was ancillary to the actual contract of carriage, there was to be implied in that contract a warranty that that part of the premises which a passenger was bound to use for the purpose of access to, or dismounting from, a train, was reasonably safe; the crack in close proximity to the edge of the platform resulted in the premises not being reasonably safe; and, therefore, the defendants were in breach of the warranty.

ACTION for damages for breach of warranty or, alternatively, for negligence.

The plaintiff, a chief inspector of the City of London police, was the holder of a season ticket on the defendants' railway from Plaistow station to Mansion House station. On July 21, 1949, on his way to work at 8.50 a.m. he was standing on the west bound platform at Plaistow station when a train came in. He had taken a few paces towards it when his right foot caught in a crack between a paving stone and a coping stone along the edge of the platform so that he stumbled, and, later, it was found that he had suffered a fracture of a bone in the foot. As a result he was unable to return to sedentary duties until Oct. 24, and to full duties until Nov. 11. The plaintiff claimed that there had been a breach of an implied warranty in the contract contained in the season ticket that the station platform should be reasonably safe, or, alternatively, a breach of general duty owed to him. It was contended for the defendants that their contract with the plaintiff was one of carriage from Plaistow station to Mansion House station and back, and that any implied warranty extended only to the actual period when the carriage was taking place, and not to the premises to which the plaintiff had access for the purpose of commencing the carriage. They further contended that, if there was any breach of duty on their part, which they denied, it was actionable in tort only and not in contract.

Sir Shirley Worthington-Evans for the plaintiff,
Southall for the defendants.

PARKER, J., stated the facts and continued: The first question that arises is whether the defendants have failed to perform any contractual duty to the plaintiff. He was the holder of a season ticket from Plaistow to Mansion House. What the conditions of that ticket were I do not know and I have little doubt they are immaterial to this action, otherwise I should have been referred to them. It is said on the plaintiff's behalf that by reason of the contract contained in that ticket there was a duty on the defendants as expressed in Macleanan v. Segar (1) where it was held that by reason of the contractual relationship between an innkeeper and his guest there was an implied warranty that the premises were as safe as reasonable care and skill on the part of anyone could make them for the purpose of personal use by the guest. In the alternative, it is said that, if the duty is not as high as that, it is as high as the duty which DU PARCQ, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the King's Bench Division, found in Gillmore v. London County Council (2). In that case the plaintiff, who had paid a fee to the London County Council to partake in certain physical training classes, had slipped and injured his left foot in the hall, which had a polished floor, where these classes were taking place. The learned judge there said ([1938] 4 All E.R. 333):

"I am not sure that one can apply to a case of this kind the rule which has been pressed upon me associated with the case of Macleanan v. Segar (1). I think that the proper way to put it is this. If any person or body of persons invite a man for reward to take part in physical training, and invite him to come for that purpose to premises which they have hired, or of which for the time being they are in possession, then, in those circumstances, that person or body of persons impliedly warrant that they have taken reasonable care to see that the premises are in all respects reasonably safe for the purpose."

Counsel for the defendants argues with considerable force that the only contract between the parties is the contract of carriage and that any implied warranty only extends to the actual period when the carriage is taking place. He points out that in all, or nearly all, of the reported cases that deal with the duty of railways in such circumstances as these the plaintiff's claim is always made in tort and not in contract. Counsel for the defendants argues that the implied warranty in Maclean v. Segar (1) does not extend to the premises to which a passenger has access for the purpose of commencing the carriage.

I think that that is too narrow a view. It seems to me that there must be a contractual duty in relation to the premises which the passenger is bound to use for the purpose of access to the train or for dismounting from the train, and, although access to the premises is what one might call ancillary to the actual contract of carriage, it seems to me that in relation to those premises—certainly in relation to those premises which are so near the edge of the platform—over which a passenger is going to step to mount the train there is an implied warranty as to the premises being reasonably safe. I think that the proper test here is that laid down, not in Maclean v. Segar (1), but by DU PARCQ, L.J., in Gillmore v. London County Council (2). I think that the proper direction which I should give myself is to ask whether the defendants have taken reasonable care to see that the platform in this particular position was in all respects reasonably safe for the purpose, and I should also go on to direct myself that, in considering what is reasonable, perfection must not be required and that it must not be expected that the platform should be absolutely perfect throughout. Finally, as the learned judge said in Gillmore's case (2), I should not consider it to be conclusive, to show that the platform was reasonably safe, that it has been used by hundreds and thousands of passengers without injury to anybody.

Was this platform in this particular position reasonably safe? In considering that, it is important to bear in mind that the position in question was near the platform's edge. It is, as I have described it, between the York stone and the coping stone forming the edge of the platform. It is, therefore, a position where people frequently have to move quickly, jostled by other people, without any opportunity of looking to see where they are going, and I think that a different standard is required for a platform in that position than, say, the paving adjoining a highway where people can see where they are going and where their attention is not all the time focussed on something else. It may be that the chances of anyone suffering damage by this crack were fairly remote, but it does seem to me that anybody using the platform at that point is entitled to have a reasonably flat or even surface on which to find his way on and off the train. No doubt, this duty may put a heavy burden on the Railway Executive, and I have throughout deliberately sought to limit the duty to the close proximity of the platform's edge without dealing with any question of paving in passages leading to a platform or the like or even of the back part of a platform. In the position in which this crack was, it was, I think, a danger, and the premises clearly were not reasonably safe in all the circumstances.

That being so, it becomes unnecessary for me to deal with the alternative way in which the case was put, namely, on Indermaur v. Dames (3). I think it is sufficient for me to say that on that aspect of the case the plaintiff is in very considerable difficulty. Without deciding the matter in any way, I find it hard to believe that there was any breach of duty on the part of the defendants within the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (3) as qualified in Horton v. London Graving Dock Co. (4).

LANCASHIRE WELDERS, LTD. v. HARLAND AND WOLFF, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Singleton and Birkett, L.JJ.), November 7, 1950.]

Judgment—Judgment on admission of facts—Discretion of court—Specially indorsed writ—Unconditional leave to defend granted although claim partially admitted—Defence partially admitting claim—Payment into court—R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6.

The plaintiffs issued a writ specially indorsed under R.S.C., Ord. 3, r. 6, claiming £31,657 14s. 2d., being the balance of moneys due for work done and services rendered by the plaintiffs for and to the defendants. The plaintiffs applied by summons under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for summary judgment, and in answer the defendants filed an affidavit in which they admitted that an amount of £1,694 19s. 9d. was owing to the plaintiffs, but disputed the claim as to the residue. The district registrar gave unconditional leave to defend as to the whole. That decision was not made the subject of appeal. Later, the defendants filed a defence in which they admitted indebtedness in the sum of £1,756 18s. 8d. (which they paid into court in full satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim), but disputed the claim as to the residue. On that defence, the plaintiffs issued a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, asking for judgment for the sum admitted in the defence. The district registrar refused the order asked for and his order was affirmed by the judge, who gave weight to the fact that, on the similar question being before the court on the summons under Ord. 14, no such order was made. On further appeal by the plaintiffs,

HELD: the facts that judgment had not been given for the sum admitted to be due in the proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 14, that the amount claimed was very much larger than the amount admitted, and that the amount of the claim, so far as admitted in the defence, had been paid into court afforded no reason why judgment should not be given for the plaintiffs under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6; to refuse the relief claimed would result in injustice to the plaintiffs; and, therefore, the judge's order, although it depended on the exercise of his discretion under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, would be reversed.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of McNAIR, J., made in chambers on Oct. 24, 1950, affirming an order of the district registrar of Liverpool refusing an application by the plaintiffs for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6. The learned judge held (having regard, inter alia, to the fact that an application by the plaintiffs for summary judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, had been refused) that the application under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, should also be refused. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

M. L. Lyell and de Ferrars for the plaintiffs,
Olson for the defendants.

COHEN, L.J.: The writ in this matter was issued on Jan. 7, 1949. It was a specially indorsed writ by which the plaintiffs claimed £31,657 14s. 2d., being the balance of moneys due for work done and services rendered by them for and to the defendants from June, 1943, to 1946. The plaintiffs applied under R.S.C., Ord. 14, for summary judgment, and in answer to that summons an affidavit was filed on behalf of the defendants which contained this paragraph:

"The defendants admit that on current account for work executed by the plaintiffs as at Mar. 31, 1947, there is a balance due and owing to the plaintiffs of £1,694 19s. 9d. Payment of this sum was offered to the plaintiffs before the writ was issued in this action, but was declined on their behalf."

It was agreed that that offer was conditional on the plaintiffs accepting the sum in full satisfaction of the balance of account between the parties. On that affidavit the district registrar gave the defendants unconditional leave to defend the action. It seems to me, prima facie, though we have not heard the full facts, that that order is not in accordance with what is the generally accepted practice where part of the claim is admitted. In THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1949, p. 206, under the heading "Part of claim admitted" is this statement:

"The proper order is judgment for plaintiff for amount admitted, and unconditional leave to defend as to residue."

The defendants, however, were given unconditional leave to defend, and it would, I think, have been open to them to put in a defence denying any liability, although, if they had gone to trial on such a defence, their witnesses would have been liable to cross-examination on the paragraph which I have read from their affidavit. On June 28, 1950, the defendants put in a defence in which they admitted that they were indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £1,756 18s. 8d., i.e., about £60 more than the amount for which they had previously admitted liability. They alleged that they had a good defence as regards the balance, on the ground that the work concerned was done under a contract which, they said, bound the parties to conform to certain Admiralty schedules with which the accounts rendered were not in conformity. On Oct. 7, 1950, the summons now before us was issued asking for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, for £1,756 18s. 8d.

R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, provides:

"Any party may at any stage of a cause or matter, where admissions of fact have been made, either on the pleadings, or otherwise, apply to the court or a judge for such judgment or order as upon such admissions he may be entitled to, without waiting for the determination of any other question between the parties; and the court or a judge may upon such application make such order, or give such judgment, as the court or judge may think just."

Counsel for the defendants says, and it is undoubtedly true, that the power of the court under this rule is discretionary, and so he argues that, applying the ordinary rules, we ought not to interfere with the exercise of the judge's discretion unless he can be shown to have gone wrong in principle, or, on the authority of Evans v. Bartlam (1), it can be otherwise established that injustice would be done if the order were allowed to stand. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on a previous decision of this court in Contract Discount Corp., Ltd. v. Overlyne Trading Co., Ltd. (2), which bears a very considerable similarity to the case now before us. In that case the plaintiffs were suing for the balance of the price of goods sold and delivered. When the summons under R.S.C., Ord. 14, came before the court there was this important difference between the two cases. At that time the defendants denied all liability, and, accordingly, there can be no question but that, if leave to defend was given, it had to be unconditional. Then they proceeded to put in a defence. In para. 1 of their amended defence they admitted liability to the plaintiffs for the sum of £485 9s. 2d., part of the sum claimed, but alleged that they had a good defence as to the balance. A summons similar to that with which we are dealing was taken out, and the master made an order that the plaintiffs should be allowed to enter judgment for the sum admitted, but, on appeal to the judge, the judge reversed that order and the matter was brought before the Court of Appeal, composed of SOMERVELL, L.J., and myself. We have not a copy of the judgment, because it is not a reported case, but counsel for the plaintiffs was able to produce a note of the judgment and from that we can gather the ground on which the court decided the matter. In that case, as in this, there had been a lodgment of money in court in a form which made it plain that the plaintiffs could only take the money out if they were prepared to accept the amount paid in in full satisfaction of their claim. SOMERVELL, L.J., stated that this court does not interfere with a discretionary order unless the judge errs in principle, but he expressed the view that, where the defendant admitted that the plaintiff was entitled to £485, the issue being only as to the balance, it is prima facie not just that the plaintiff should stand out of the money or take it out of court on condition of abandoning the balance.

In matters of this kind one case cannot be regarded as an absolute precedent for another. I must, therefore, turn to consider what are the grounds on which, in this case, McNAIR, J., thought that it was right to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit which, I think, R.S.C., Ord. 32, r. 6, was intended to confer on them in respect of the admission that was made. Counsel for the defendants said that the learned judge had regard to the whole history of the case and that he attached importance, among other things, to what had happened under the procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 14. He made it clear that he was not treating the matter as res judicata, but he thought that the fact that the issue had already been before the court on the summons under R.S.C., Ord. 14, and that no order had then been made allowing the plaintiffs to sign judgment for the sum admitted, was of importance. Speaking for myself, I do not think that that was a factor which had any real importance. The defendants have had the benefit of what, prima facie, appears to have been a mistake on the part of the district registrar. They could, as I said, have put in a defence denying any liability. When they repeat the admission in their defence, and, indeed, admit a slightly larger sum than they admitted in the affidavit in answer to the summons, it seems to me that the summons under R.S.C., Ord. 14, affords no reason why it should cease to be just to allow the plaintiffs to recover the sum which, it is unconditionally admitted, they are entitled to in any event.

Counsel for the defendants then contends that it would be unfair to deprive the defendants of the advantage of having paid the money into court. That, says counsel, would have enabled them to recover judgment if nothing further was found due beyond the amount which they had paid into court. That, again, I do not think is a factor of any real weight because, as SINGLETON, L.J., pointed out during the argument, if judgment is entered now for the admitted sum and at the trial of the action nothing is found to be due, the defendants will still recover the whole of the costs subsequent to to-day or to the date of the judgment which we should allow to be entered.

The next matter which was raised by counsel for the defendants was that the issues which are raised as a defence to the balance are really common to the whole matter, and that, in deciding those issues, the court would be dealing also with the matter of the £1,756. I do not think that that is a relevant consideration. There is no suggestion that, whatever the answer to the issues outstanding may be, the plaintiffs will not be entitled to their £1,756, and I cannot think that the fact that the issues are, perhaps, not so clearly settled as they were in the Contract Discount Corpn. case (2) is a reason why the plaintiffs should be deprived of their rights. It was then contended by counsel for the defendants that the contrast between the amount claimed and the amount admitted is another reason why the order should not be made. No doubt, £31,000 is a very much larger sum than £1,700, but £1,700 is a very substantial sum without which, I do not say these plaintiffs, but some plaintiffs, might be seriously embarrassed in conducting the proceedings and enforcing the rights to which they claim to be entitled. I cannot think that the fact that the sum claimed is very much larger is a ground on which the plaintiffs should be deprived of that which is admittedly their due. Lastly, it was said that, because of the offer of payment in full satisfaction before the action was brought, the court might well, if the action were allowed to go to trial, have deprived the plaintiffs of any costs, and, indeed, have ordered them to pay the costs of the whole action. It is possible that such an order would be made, but I should have thought that it was improbable. In any event, I do not think that that is a consideration to which the judge ought to have given weight. Finally, I come to this conclusion. It seems to me that, if we allow the order to stand depriving the plaintiffs of the use of the £1,756 18s. 8d., which is admitted to be their money, we may be inflicting on them an injustice within the meaning of Evans v. Bartlam (1), and that we shall not be interfering with any of the principles applicable to discretion cases if we reverse the order of the learned judge and make the order which the plaintiffs seek, viz., to allow them to enter judgment for the admitted sum. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

JAMES v. THOMAS H. KENT & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ., and Romer, J.), November 10, 1950.]

Contract—Memorandum or note—Contract of service—No mention of nature of duties—Implication of term as to reasonable notice of termination of contract where memorandum insufficient—Statute of Frauds, 1677 (c. 3), s. 4.

A company was incorporated on June 4, 1946, and in the minutes of a meeting of the company held on June 17, 1946, it was stated: "First directors. The appointments of Messrs. Kent and James as first directors of the company was approved subject to a three-year contract with the company at salaries of £1,020 and £420 per annum respectively." At a directors' meeting on the same day it was resolved to request the company's solicitor to prepare service agreements for a minimum period of three years for Kent and James. The agreements were never, in fact, prepared. On Dec. 22, 1948, James was summarily dismissed, and he claimed the amount of his salary for the remainder of his three years' term of office. The company pleaded that the agreement was not to be performed within one year and there was no memorandum or note of it to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4.

HELD: (i) if there was an oral contract of employment for three years the minute of June 17, 1946, did not constitute a sufficient memorandum of it for the purposes of s. 4 because there was no indication in the minute of the general nature of the duties which James had to perform, and, therefore, the contract was unenforceable.

(ii) it was impossible to imply that James was entitled to reasonable notice, because so to do would be to imply a fresh contract from acts done in pursuance of an unenforceable express contract while that contract was still in existence.

Britain v. Rossiter (1879) (11 Q.B.D. 123), followed.

(iii) on the construction of the minutes, the parties had agreed subject to the drawing up of a formal contract, and, as the formal contract had never been drawn up, there had been no contract for three years; there was a contract of employment for an unspecified period; and James was entitled to reasonable notice of the termination of that contract or payment of salary in lieu of such notice.

Per DENNING, L.J.: If the servant had fully performed his part of the contract by serving his full time, or, what is the same thing, by serving his full time save when excused by sickness, he could sue for his stipulated wages. So, also, if he had served up to the time when any instalment fell due, he could sue for that instalment. In those cases, his action would be in debt on an executed consideration to which the Statute of Frauds has no application.

Scott v. Pattison ([1923] 2 K.B. 723), criticised by DENNING, L.J.

[EDITORIAL NOTE.] The court decided this case in favour of the appellant on the basis of an argument which was not raised by him at first instance. The court is naturally reluctant to refuse to hear an argument which is reasonably open to the appellant on the basis of the facts and evidence adduced, but LORD BIRKENHEAD, L.C., in Wilson v. United Counties Bank, Ltd. ([1920] A.C. 106) took the view that "unless the circumstances are wholly exceptional, appellants must be strictly held to the grounds of appeal which they think proper to set forth in the formal documents which are demanded from them . . . In the present case, both in the Court of Appeal and before your Lordships, entirely new contentions have been submitted on behalf of the defendants. The practice is extremely inconvenient and ought in my judgment to be discouraged in every possible way." The general rule appears to be that a party at first instance omits a contention at his peril, but in a proper case the appellate court will, in its discretion, admit a new argument of the appellant.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., dated June 26, 1950.

The plaintiff claimed £175 as his salary due to him for the period unexpired of an oral contract of personal service for three years, or, alternatively, as damages for breach of contract and/or wrongful dismissal. PARKER, J., held that there was no sufficient memorandum of the alleged contract for the purpose of the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4, and that no agreement to give reasonable notice could be implied. On appeal, the plaintiff argued, in the alternative, that there had been no contract for a definite term, and that in the circumstances he was entitled to reasonable notice or payment of salary in lieu of such notice.

Rees-Davies for the plaintiff.

Aarvold for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff, Mr. Frank James, claims from the defendants, Messrs. Thomas H. Kent & Co., Ltd., the sum of £175, as five months' salary due to him under a service agreement with the defendants. Alternatively, the plaintiff claims damages for breach of agreement and/or wrongful dismissal. The case made in the court below was that the plaintiff had, as the learned judge found, an oral agreement with the defendants for employment in a garage business for three years. He was dismissed, which is not disputed, and the five months in respect of which salary is claimed is the balance of the three years which was covered by the agreement between him and the defendants. In their defence the defendants said with regard to that agreement, which they first denied:

"If any such agreement as alleged was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, such agreement was a contract not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof and there is no memorandum in writing of the alleged contract sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds."

It was not disputed that the doctrine of part performance applies to a service agreement within the Statute of Frauds. The learned judge held that there was such an agreement, but he held there was no sufficient memorandum of it, and then he held that in those circumstances the plaintiff could not recover anything for wrongful dismissal. Counsel for the plaintiff argued before the learned judge, and it was the first of his arguments before us, that in cases where the court finds an oral agreement but no sufficient memorandum of it, nevertheless, if the person serving under that agreement is dismissed, he can claim damages for wrongful dismissal on the basis that he was entitled to a reasonable notice.

The defendant company was incorporated on June 4, 1946, and took over a business which had been previously carried on by the plaintiff's mother, the plaintiff working in the garage. A Mr. Kent, whose name is borne by the defendant company, was concerned in the negotiations. It appears that he bought the freehold of the garage for £15,000. There was to be a share capital of £5,000, he was to have 9,000 shares and the plaintiff 1,000, and the other shares were to be split up. The company was not incorporated until June, 1946. In the minutes of a meeting of the members of Thos. H. Kent & Co., Ltd., held at Westbridge Road on June 17, 1946, it is stated that:

"First directors. The appointments of Messrs. Kent and James as first directors of the company was approved subject to a three-year contract with the company at salaries of £1,020 and £420 per annum respectively."

There was a meeting of the directors on the same day and it was resolved to appoint Mr. Gibson as solicitor and to request him to prepare service agreements for a minimum period of three years for Mr. Kent and the plaintiff. No service agreements, however, were ever prepared. The plaintiff was dismissed on Dec. 22, 1948. PARKER, J., found that there was an oral agreement for three years on those terms, and, therefore, the first question we have to consider is: Assuming that there was such an oral agreement, was there a sufficient memorandum of it in writing to satisfy the statute? One point taken was that it was not clear from the minute at what date the agreement started. We were referred to authorities [Re Alexander's Timber Co. (1) and Elliott v. Roberts (2)] which decided that that was a vital matter, so that if the date on which service is to start cannot be found in the alleged memorandum, it is not a sufficient memorandum. I do not propose to deal with that point. I think it may well be that this minute, in its context, pointed to the agreement beginning on June 4, 1946, but, however that may be, I think it clearly appears that the minute was not a sufficient memorandum because it gave no indication, special or general, as to the nature of the duties which the plaintiff was to perform. Under a service agreement a man may often have to do many things on orders which he receives from his employers, but, it seems to me, to satisfy the statute, there must be some indication of the general nature of the duties he has to perform and his position as an employee in the company's service. I, therefore, think that the learned judge was right in saying there was no sufficient memorandum. On that basis, the learned judge held that he could not recover damages for wrongful dismissal.

This is the paragraph in the learned judge's judgment which counsel for the plaintiff challenges:

"That being so, it seems to me that the claim on the agreement alleged, as to which [the plaintiff] gave evidence before me, must fail on the ground that it is unenforceable in law. It is said by counsel for the plaintiff in the alternative that, even if he fails to establish an enforceable agreement in those terms, his client is nevertheless entitled to damages for wrongful dismissal, broadly speaking, on this basis, that he did, in fact, serve the company from day to day and from month to month and from year to year, in a managerial capacity, and that he cannot, as it were, be thrown out for no reason assigned and without notice, and he says in the alternative that his client is entitled to six months' or thereabouts, wages as reasonable notice. The difficulty I feel about that claim, attractive as it is, is that there is really only one contract alleged—the contract as to which [the plaintiff] gave evidence in the witness box, and his claim is under that contract. And if, as I have held, that contract, although a contract in being, is unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds, I cannot see how any alternative claim can lie. Indeed, if an alternative claim in such circumstances did lie, it would in effect render the Statute of Frauds in this respect a complete nullity."

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that that was wrong and said that, having to disregard the contract, you must then imply a term under which the plaintiff was entitled to reasonable notice. I agree with the learned judge on that point. It has often been laid down that, if a man has actually done work under a contract of service which is unenforceable under s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds, work for which he has not been paid, he can recover as on a quantum meruit any reasonable remuneration, but that is not this point. The question here is whether we can imply a term as to notice. On that matter, counsel for the defendants relied on the old and often cited case in this connection, Britain v. Rossiter (3), where it was held (11 Q.B.D. 123):

"A contract, which is not enforceable by reason of the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, s. 4, nevertheless is an existing contract and is not void altogether, and a fresh contract cannot be implied from acts done in pursuance of it."

That seems to me to be precisely what counsel for the plaintiff is asking us to do. He is asking us to imply a new contract of service "from acts done in pursuance" of the contract to which his client deposed. BRETT, L.J., said (11 Q.B.D. 127):

"It seems to me impossible that a new contract can be implied from the doing of acts which were clearly done in performance of the first contract only, and to infer from them a fresh contract would be to draw an inference contrary to the fact."

THESIGER, L.J., said (ibid., 132):

"But I need not discuss this question further, for in Snelling v. Huntingfield (Lord) (4), which has never been overruled but on the contrary has been often followed, it was held that a contract not enforceable by reason of the Statute of Frauds, s. 4, nevertheless existed, and no contract can be implied where an express contract exists."

This area of law was considered in Scott v. Pattison (5) where it was held ([1923] 2 K.B. 723):

A "That he was entitled to sue in assumpsit upon an implied promise by the defendant to pay for the services rendered, and for that purpose to rely upon a local custom, if proved, to pay wages during absence from work through illness."

That is an example of the principle to which I have already referred.

B On those points, therefore, I come to the conclusion that on the case as presented to him the learned judge was right, but, in the course of argument here the question arose whether there ever was a concluded contract for three years? It seems to me reasonably plain that when the matter mentioned in the minute was resolved there was no concluded agreement for three years. There were matters which might well come up for discussion with regard to the draft agreement. The plaintiff's appointment was to be "subject to contract"—subject to the preparation of a draft which the board would consider. On that construction C of this document, I think that there was no binding agreement for three years. The solicitor failed to produce the draft agreement, and an agreement that the plaintiff and the company should be bound for a three years' period was never signed. If it had not been the case of a company, the position might have been different, but here was a matter which had come before the board, and I think D it is impossible to think of circumstances which would render binding for three years the proposed arrangement which was to be "subject to contract."

E For these reasons, the plaintiff falls to be considered as a man employed at the work I have described with a contract which fixed his remuneration—which he was paid until he was dismissed—but without any term which fixed the period of the employment. In those circumstances, the law requires a reasonable period of notice. PARKER, J., decided on three months, counsel for the plaintiff suggested that six months was more appropriate, and counsel for the defendants suggested one month. I see no reason to disagree with the period decided on by the learned judge. Therefore, in my judgment, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed by way of damages for loss of earnings for three months.

F DENNING, L.J.: On the points argued before the learned judge, I agree with him. Assuming there was a concluded oral agreement to employ the plaintiff for three years and there was no memorandum of it sufficient to satisfy the statute, then the plaintiff could not sue for wrongful dismissal. He could not set up the special agreement because of the statute, and he could not rely on an implied agreement because one cannot have an implied contract covering the same ground as an existing express contract. The effect of the statute is, not to make an agree- G ment void, but only to make it unenforceable. There would, therefore, still be in existence a special contract dealing with the duration of the service, and, while it remained in existence, there could not be an implied contract on the self-same point. That appears from Britain v. Rossiter (3).

H If the plaintiff had fully performed his part of the contract by serving his full time, or, what is the same thing, by serving his full time save when excused by sickness, he could sue for his stipulated wages. So, also, if he had served up to the time when any instalment fell due, he could sue for that instalment. In those cases his action would be in debt on an executed consideration to which the Statute of Frauds has no application. That was expressly laid down by TINDAL, C.J., in Souch v. Strawbridge (6) (2 C.B. 814), and is, I think, still good law to-day. I know that a Divisional Court in Scott v. Pattison (5) decided the contrary, but I do not think they were right for reasons which I elaborated some time ago in an article which I wrote in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW (41 L.Q.R.

79) and to which I still adhere. Even if the servant has not served his full time, or the time necessary to earn the next instalment, but is dismissed beforehand without good cause, he can recover payment for any work he has done as on a quantum meruit. It used to be said in the old days that in that case his action was on an implied contract, but that is not a correct way of approach because, in this case, as in the other, you cannot have an implied contract covering the same ground as an existing special contract. The proper ground of the claim is not in contract at all, but in restitution. It is money which, in justice, ought to be paid for services rendered. The present claim for wrongful dismissal cannot be put on any such footing because restitution is confined to cases where the defendant has received money which he ought to restore, or benefits for which he ought to pay. A claim for damages for wrongful dismissal can only rest in contract, and, if that contract is unenforceable by reason of the Statute of Frauds, the claim must fail. This is the ground on which the judge dismissed the claim, and on that I entirely agree with him.

There was, however, another point which was not argued before the learned judge. When the facts of this case are examined it becomes plain that there was no concluded agreement to employ the plaintiff for three years. It was subject to a condition, "subject to a contract being executed binding him for three years," and no contract was ever executed. The result is that the plaintiff was employed for no determinate time. It was a general employment, (not caught by the statute,) in which it is always implied that it is only determinable by reasonable notice. Three months' notice would be reasonable, and the plaintiff is entitled to damages on that basis. This point was not put before the learned judge, but I think we should give effect to it. I cannot see that any evidence could have been called which would have altered the position, or that the defendants are in any way prejudiced by its not being taken before, save in regard to costs, and we can make provision for them. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed; judgment for the plaintiff for £105 with costs below; plaintiff to pay to the defendants the costs of appeal.

HOWGATE v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Barry, J.), October 30, 31, November 1, 3, 1950.]

War Injury—Injury caused by impact of aircraft on property—Injury sustained by passenger in aircraft—Injury sustained abroad—Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939 (c. 82), s. 8 (1).

An aircraft, which was Crown property and was operated by and under the Control of Transport Command of the Royal Air Force, caught fire after twice touching down when landing at Karachi, India, during the recent war, and a passenger in the aircraft was killed. In an action brought by his executor against the captain and the second pilot of the aircraft under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, it was admitted that the death of the passenger resulted from the accident and was caused by the negligence of these defendants. On the question whether the claim against the defendants was barred by s. 3 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, on the ground that the passenger's death was due to a "war injury" within s. 8 (1) of the Act, i.e., an injury caused by the impact on the aerodrome of the aircraft,

HELD: (i) the words "physical injuries . . . caused by the impact on any . . . property" of a British or allied aircraft, in the definition of "war injuries" in s. 8 (1) (b) of the Act of 1939, included injuries sustained by a passenger travelling in that aircraft.

(ii) on the facts, there was no evidence to show that the impact of the aircraft was a real and effective cause of the injuries, and, therefore, the executor was not precluded by s. 3 (1) of the Act from bringing the action.

Per curiam: the Act of 1939 applies to all British subjects who suffer "war injuries," within the meaning of the definition of that term, in any part of the world.

ACTION for damages for negligence under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934.

The plaintiff was the executor of the deceased, a passenger in an aircraft belonging to the Crown and operated by and under the control of Transport Command of the Royal Air Force, who had been killed in 1944 in an accident at Mauripur Airfield, Karachi, India, through the admitted negligence of the two defendants, the captain and second pilot of the aircraft. The action was brought for the benefit of the widow and six children of the deceased. It was contended for the defendants (i) that the action was barred by s. 3 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, since the injuries of the deceased, which caused his death, were war injuries, being physical injuries caused by the impact of the aircraft on property, viz., the aerodrome, within the meaning of the definition of "war injuries" in s. 8 (1) of the Act, and (ii) that the event causing the injuries was not actionable in this country since the Act of 1939 had no extra-territorial application.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and Skelhorn for the plaintiff.

Sir Walter Monckton, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. BARRY, J., read the following judgment. This is a claim brought by the plaintiff, suing as an executor, under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The action is brought for the benefit of the widow and six children of the late Mr. Reginald Bousfield Lagden and for the benefit of the deceased's estate. The Attorney-General was at one time joined as a defendant, but for reasons which are no longer material the plaintiff's action against him was discontinued in January, 1948. A

The deceased met his death when travelling under official auspices from England to India in an aeroplane which was the property of the Crown and operated by and under the control of Transport Command of the Royal Air Force. The two remaining defendants, Flight Lieutenant Bagnall and Pilot Officer Hutchings, were respectively the captain and second pilot of this aircraft. On Oct. 20, 1944, the aircraft in which the deceased was a passenger landed at the Mauripur Airfield, Karachi, but overran the prepared runway and ultimately burst into flames a short distance from the boundary of the airfield. The deceased appears to have been unable to escape from the burning machine and met his death from asphyxia followed by charring. It is admitted that his death resulted directly from this very distressing accident and that the accident itself was caused by the negligence of the two defendants. The defendants, however, contend that the injuries which brought about the death of the deceased were "war injuries," within the definition of that term contained in s. 8 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, and that, in consequence, the plaintiff's claim against them founded on their negligence or breach of duty is barred by s. 3 of that Act. The sole issue for the determination of the court is whether or not the provisions of the last-mentioned section relieve the defendants from the liability to pay damages which, on the admitted facts, would otherwise fall on them. B C D

Although this issue can be simply stated, it gives rise to a number of problems of considerable nicety. It must first be ascertained whether the injury suffered by the deceased can properly be described as "war injuries," within the meaning of s. 8 (1) of the Act of 1939, and, if so, whether the provisions of the Act itself, or, alternatively, of s. 3 of the Act, have any application when the injuries complained of were sustained outside the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. The definition of "war injuries," as contained in s. 8 (1) of the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, reads thus: E F

" ' War injuries ' means physical injuries—(a) caused by (i) the discharge of any missile (including liquids and gas); or (ii) the use of any weapon, explosive or other noxious thing; or (iii) the doing of any other injurious act; either by the enemy or in combating the enemy or in repelling an imagined attack by the enemy; or (b) caused by the impact on any person or property of any enemy aircraft, or any aircraft belonging to, or held by any person on behalf of or for the benefit of, His Majesty or any allied power, or any part of, or anything dropped from, any such aircraft." G

Paragraph (b) is the material one in this case.

Counsel for the plaintiff made two distinct submissions in regard to the construction of these words. First, he contended that in their true meaning the words "physical injuries . . . caused by the impact on any . . . property of any" British or allied aircraft do not include injuries sustained by a passenger in the aircraft concerned. From the logical point of view, it seems to me that there is much that can be said in support of this construction. Looking at the definition of "war injuries" as a whole, it is, I think, extremely doubtful whether the legislature had in mind the peculiar position of a passenger in a H

British or allied aircraft which makes impact with any property. Had the position of passengers been given any specific consideration, it is difficult to believe that no provision would have been made to mitigate some of the strange anomalies to which counsel for the plaintiff has drawn attention. I need only to mention one of them. If an aircraft falls into, and makes impact with, the sea, which can hardly be described as "any property," the passenger or his dependants would not be entitled to a pension under any scheme made by the Minister of Pensions, but could, if negligence or breach of duty were established, recover damages for the injuries sustained. If, on the other hand, the aircraft fell on, or made impact with, the land, the property of which must necessarily be vested either in some subject or in the Crown, the position of the passenger or his dependants would be wholly reversed. It is unlikely that this and other curious results can have been intentional, but it is the duty of the court to construe the words of the definition according to their plain and obvious meaning and it cannot do violence to the wording of a statute merely because that wording may lead to curious results.

Section 1 (1) of the Act provides:

"The Minister may make a scheme . . . providing for the making of payments in respect of . . . (a) war injuries sustained by gainfully occupied persons (with such exceptions, if any, as may be specified in the scheme) and by persons of such other classes as may be so specified . . ."

Section 3 refers to a "war injury" sustained by "any person," and the definition of "war injuries" in s. 8 (1) contains no words which expressly or by implication point to the exclusion of passengers in a British or allied aircraft.

In the face of these broad and general provisions, I have come to the conclusion that the court would not be justified in importing an exception relating to passengers, which, had the legislature so intended, could so easily have been incorporated in the Act by express words. Counsel for the plaintiff drew my attention to certain passages in MAXWELL ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 9th ed., pp. 207-214, and also to Yates v. R. (1), but I do not think that the principles there enunciated can properly be applied unless the words of the statute are capable of two reasonable interpretations or there are compelling reasons for construing some wide and general word or words in a more restricted sense than they are capable of bearing. I can find no such compelling reasons in the present case, and I am constrained to hold that a passenger who, in the true sense, suffers injury by the impact on any property of the aircraft in which he is travelling falls within the provisions of the Act. I do so with less hesitation when it is recalled, as pointed out in a number of cases, that, with the exception of s. 3, the object of the Act is to confer benefits on injured persons rather than to deprive them of their normal legal rights. It would, I think, be difficult for the Crown to argue that a person who was included among the classes specified in the scheme and suffered injuries when an aeroplane in which he was travelling crashed into a house should be deprived of compensation merely because he was a passenger.

To establish their defence under s. 3 of the Act, it is, however, necessary for the defendants to provide affirmative proof that the deceased's injuries were, in truth, "war injuries," that is to say, injuries caused by the impact on any property of an aircraft belonging to His Majesty. From the wording of the definition it is, I think, clear that the injuries must be caused by the impact, and not by some other mishap which was causally unconnected with the impact. Were the injuries of the deceased caused by the impact of this aircraft with the ground or with any other property? I have been unable to obtain much assistance from the authorities on this point which have been cited to me. In Greenfield v. London & North Eastern Ry. Co. (2) the Court of Appeal took the view that the word "cause" as contained in the definition contained in s. 8 (1) of the Act meant, and only meant, the immediate and precipitating cause of the injury. This case was, however, decided before the decision of the House of Lords in Adams v. Naylor (3), and I respectfully agree with the decision of DENNING, J. (as he then was), in Minister of Pensions v. Chennell (4) that the authority of Greenfield's case (2) has been seriously undermined by the later decision of the House of Lords. It can, I think, no longer be said that the "impact" must be the sole or immediate or precipitating cause of the injuries. Other causes may also operate to bring about the injuries, but, none the less, the impact must be, of itself, a real and effective cause. It is not, in my judgment, a real and effective cause, if it is nothing more than an event or circumstance on which the true causes either previously or subsequently operate. In considering the causal nature of any event it is, I think, essential to bear in mind the words of LORD WRIGHT in the case of Yorkshire Dale S.S. Co., Ltd. v. Minister of War Transport (5) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 15):

"This choice of the real or efficient cause from out of the whole complex of the facts must be made by applying commonsense standards."

The same principle, in my judgment, applies when considering whether any one event is or is not one of the real or efficient causes of another.

Before this question can be answered it is necessary to examine the facts of this unhappy accident. [HIS LORDSHIP stated that the only impacts which were disclosed by the evidence were those which occurred on the two occasions when the aircraft touched down, but that there was nothing to suggest that either of these impacts was an effective cause of the aircraft swinging round or catching fire, and continued :] In these circumstances, I am bound to find that the defendants have failed to prove that the injuries and death of the deceased, were caused by the impact on any property of an aircraft belonging to His Majesty and that in consequence the deceased's injuries were not "war injuries" within the definition contained in s. 8 of the Act of 1939. The provisions of s. 3 of the Act are, therefore, inapplicable and the plaintiff is entitled to enforce his ordinary legal rights on behalf of the dependants and the estate. This finding disposes of the case, save as to the amount of damages which should be awarded, but, out of deference to the arguments presented to me, I think it is right for me to say a few words as to one other major issue which was fully debated at the trial.

Counsel for the plaintiff contended that the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939, had no extra-territorial application and that injuries sustained outside the United Kingdom did not fall within any of its provisions. He based this argument upon the broad proposition set out in MAXWELL ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (9th ed.), at p. 149, which is as follows:

"... in the absence of an intention clearly expressed or to be inferred either from its language, or from the object, subject-matter, or history of the enactment, the presumption is that Parliament does not design its statutes to operate on its subjects beyond the territorial limits of the United Kingdom."

This passage, which is well supported by some authority, was cited with approval by COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Tomalin v. Pearson (S.) & Son, Ltd. (6), when the Court of Appeal applied this principle to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. Tomalin's case (6) was followed in the case of Schwartz v. India Rubber, Gutta Percha & Telegraph Works Co., Ltd. (7). These two decisions have been criticised in the Irish case of Keegan v. Dawson (8), but they are, of course, binding on me, and Tomalin's case (6) was cited with approval by the Privy Council in the case of Krzus v. Crow's Nest Pass Coal Co. (9). These authorities have, however, no direct bearing on the construction of the Act now under consideration, more especially as the Court of Appeal, in arriving at their decision, were strongly influenced by certain provisions contained in s. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, which have no counterpart in the Personal Injuries (Emergency Provisions) Act, 1939.

Were it material to the decision of the present case, I should have felt bound to accede to the submission of counsel for the defendants that the general scheme of the Act of 1939 and the conditions of universal war which existed, or seemed likely to exist, at the time when the Act was passed, all tend to show that its application is not to be confined to the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. I think that the Act applies, inter alia, to all British subjects who suffer "war injuries" within the meaning of the definition of that term in any part of the globe. Counsel for the plaintiff pointed out that this construction of the Act might enable, for example, a British subject resident in the United States of America to recover compensation if he were injured by the impact of an American aircraft. If this were so, it would, perhaps, throw some doubt on the construction which I have indicated, but, in my judgment, Parliament has provided against any such absurdities by enabling the Minister of Pensions to specify in his scheme the classes of persons entitled to benefit under the Act. In fact, the various schemes made under the Act have imposed stringent limitations on the classes of persons who may obtain awards of compensation for injuries sustained outside the United Kingdom. I cannot, of course, have recourse to these schemes as a guide to the correct interpretation of the Act under which they were made, but I am, I think, entitled to consider them for certain limited purposes. In Billings v. Reed (10) LORD GREENE, M.R. (as he then was), referring to this subject, said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 419):

"The fact that the object of this Act was in substance what I have suggested can, I think, be seen from a consideration of the way in which the scheme has been framed pursuant to the Act itself, and with the tacit approval of Parliament as provided in the Act. At any rate, we are entitled to look at the scheme for the purpose of seeing the kind of practical treatment of these questions which Parliament has authorised."

It is abundantly clear from the wording of the various schemes made under this Act that the Minister of Pensions, to use the words of the Master of the Rolls, "with the tacit consent of Parliament" has throughout considered that "war injuries" may be sustained outside the United Kingdom and counsel for the plaintiff has, of course, been forced to contend that all these schemes have contained many provisions that were "ultra vires." As already indicated, I cannot accept this view.

Finding, as I do, that the Act of 1939 applies to "war injuries" sustained by British subjects outside the United Kingdom, it is unnecessary for me to consider an alternative submission made by counsel for the defendants that, irrespective of the territorial application of the Act, this action was, in any event, barred by s. 3, on the ground that the event which caused the injuries of the deceased was not actionable in this country. I am, however, very far from being convinced that the defendants could have availed themselves of this section if the injuries of the deceased had been "war injuries" to which the Act applied.

[His LORDSHIP assessed the damages at £17,000 under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, with £9 11s. in respect of funeral expenses, £250 for loss of expectation of life under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and £50 in respect of pain and suffering, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for these sums].

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

KERRIDGE v. LAMDIN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.J.J.), November 14, 15, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—New lease—Time for making claim—“ Within two months after service of notice ”—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 5 (2).

A tenant held business premises on a tenancy terminable by notice. On Mar. 23, 1950, the landlord gave the tenant notice to determine the tenancy. On Apr. 6, 1950, the tenant served on the landlord a notice under s. 5 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, requiring a new lease in lieu of compensation for goodwill. On June 3, 1950, the tenant applied to the county court under s. 5 (2) of the Act for an order granting a new tenancy and settling its terms.

HELD: on a true construction of s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1927, the period of two months within which the application must be made ran from the date of the service on the tenant of the notice to quit and not from the date of the service on the landlord of the tenant's notice requiring a new lease, and, consequently, his application was out of time.

[AS TO TENANT'S RIGHT TO A NEW LEASE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, pp. 297-299, para. 340 ; FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, s. 5 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 892; and FOR CASES, see 2nd DIGEST Supp.]

Case referred to:

- (1) Donegal Tweed Co., Ltd. v. Stephenson, (1929), 98 L.J.K.B. 657; 141 L.T. 262; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the landlord from a decision of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE CLARK, K.C., at Windsor County Court on June 13, 1950, refusing an application by the landlord for an order striking out the tenant's application for a new lease under s. 5 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, on the ground that, under s. 5 (2), it was out of time.

The county court judge held that on the true construction of s. 5 (2) time for making the application for an order granting a new lease and determining its terms ran from the date of the tenant's notice claiming a new lease and not from the date of the service of the notice to quit. The facts and the relevant sections of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, appear in the judgment of JENKINS, L.J.

L. A. Blundell and Plume for the landlord.
Binney for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: The present case raises a short question of construction on a provision as to time contained in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The question arises in this way. The tenant held from the landlord certain business premises on a tenancy terminable by notice. On Mar. 23, 1950, due notice was given to determine the tenancy, and, thereupon, under the provisions of the Act, the tenant became entitled under s. 4 of the Act to claim compensation for goodwill on quitting the holding by serving on the landlord the appropriate claim within one month after the service on him of the notice to quit. The tenant further became entitled, if so minded, to claim in lieu of compensation a new lease under s. 5, by service on the landlord of a notice to that effect within the period limited for making his claim for compensation, that is to say, within one month after service on him of the notice to quit. On Apr. 6, 1950, the tenant served on the landlord a notice claiming a new lease well within the period of one month allowed for that purpose.

In that state of affairs, the provisions of s. 5 (2) of the Act came into operation. To state the effect of those provisions in neutral form, they amount to this. In the case of a periodic tenancy (which is the type of tenancy here in question), where a notice claiming a new lease has been served, the county court may make an order granting a new lease and settling its terms on an application for that purpose being made by the landlord or the tenant within the period of two months therein mentioned. The tenant made his application to the county court less than two months from the date of the service on the landlord of his notice claiming a new lease, but more than two months from the date of the service by the landlord on him of the notice to quit, the date of the application to the county court being June 3, 1950.

In those circumstances, the landlord applied to the county court for an order striking out the tenant's application on the ground that it was out of time, inasmuch as the time-limit of two months ran from the date of the service by the landlord of the notice to quit and not from the date of the service by the tenant of his notice requiring a new lease. The county court judge held that on the true construction of s. 5 (2) of the Act time ran, as contended by the tenant, from the date of the service of the tenant's notice requiring a new lease, and not, as contended by the landlord, from the date of the service of the notice to quit. It followed, in the view of the deputy county court judge, that the landlord's application was ill-founded, and he dismissed it. Hence this appeal.

The point is a short one of the construction of this provision as to time. In the course of the arguments before us counsel for the landlord relied primarily on the contention that his view was clearly right on the true construction of s. 5 (2), but he also called in aid provisions in various other parts of the Act in regard to notices which, in his submission, supported his construction of s. 5 (2) as fitting in better with the other provisions of the Act than the construction advanced by counsel for the tenant. Counsel for the landlord further called in aid the general principle that, inasmuch as the Act trenches on the common law rights of landlords, the benefit of any doubt should be given to the landlord. He relied on the view expressed in MERLIN'S LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, 3rd ed., p. 41, to the effect that the contention advanced on behalf of the landlord in the present case was right. Counsel for the tenant, on the other hand, claimed that, as the Act was designed for the protection of tenants, the benefit of any doubt should be given to the tenant. He contended that his construction fitted in better with the other provisions of the Act, and, in particular, he called attention to s. 6 of the Act, under which a landlord may offer alternative accommodation. He pointed out that, if the construction of counsel for the landlord were adopted, the full time allowed to the tenant for making his application to the tribunal would coincide exactly with the time allowed to the landlord within which to give notice under s. 6 of his willingness to grant a lease of alternative accommodation and that this might result in the making by the tenant of an unnecessary application to the tribunal. Counsel for the tenant further relied on the opinion expressed in CHESHIRE'S MODERN REAL PROPERTY, 5th ed., p. 175, to the effect that his construction of s. 5 (2) of the Act was the right one.

After paying the best attention I can to these general arguments on either side, I find I can derive very little assistance from them. If an attempt to construe s. 5 (2) discloses some ambiguity, or something which on the face of it is inconsistent or unreasonable, then, no doubt, so far as it is possible to do so, it is right to resolve the doubt by seeing which interpretation will fit in better with the general scheme or intention of the Act as collected from its terms as a whole. The primary task, however, is to construe the sub-section, and, if its construction is clear, it must be given effect according to its terms, and the result cannot be affected by the fact that some different provision might be thought to be more consonant with the other terms of the Act. A matter of this kind, namely, the limitation of a period of time within which an act has to be done under a given piece of legislation, is necessarily a matter which must, in a sense, be dealt with in a somewhat arbitrary fashion. A time has to be allowed, and, provided the period prescribed is reasonably sufficient to allow of the act in question being done, there is no particular reason why the period selected should be one month, two months, three months, or of any particular length more than another. All that can be said is that, to make legislation such as this workable, definite periods must be fixed for the taking of the various steps provided for, and the construction of a provision as to time is not one on which much assistance can be expected from general principles.

Turning now to the construction of s. 5 (2), I find it desirable to refer to s. 4 (1), which begins:

"The tenant of a holding to which this Part of this Act applies shall, if a claim for the purpose is made in the prescribed manner—(i) in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, within one month after the service of the notice on the tenant; and (ii) in any other case, not more than thirty-six nor less than twelve months before the termination of the tenancy; be entitled, at the termination of the tenancy on quitting the holding, to be paid by his landlord compensation for goodwill . . ."

It is to be observed that the method of fixing time is there made to depend on whether the tenancy is a tenancy for a fixed term or a tenancy terminated by notice. In the case of a tenancy for a fixed term the time is limited by reference to a minimum period before the date fixed for the termination of the tenancy, while in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice the time is limited by reference to a maximum period after the service of the notice. That formula is worth noting in view of the language of s. 5 (2). It is, perhaps, also worth mentioning that a very similar formula appears in s. 1 (1), which is one of the sections dealing with the tenant's right to compensation for improvements. The formula there used is substantially in the same terms as the formula appearing in s. 4 (1), except that, in the case of a tenancy terminated by notice, the period allowed is one month after the notice was served on or by the tenant, that variation being due to the fact that a periodic tenant can claim compensation for improvements although he himself determines the tenancy.

Section 5 (1), which gives the tenant the option to claim a new lease instead of compensation for goodwill, provides that:

"Where the tenant alleges that, though he would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing section, the sum which could be awarded to him under that section would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill he will suffer if he removes to and carries on his trade or business in other premises, he may in lieu of claiming such compensation, at any time within the period allowed for making a claim under the said section, serve on the landlord notice requiring a new lease of the premises at which the trade or business is carried on to be granted to him."

That period is fixed by s. 4 (1), and is "within one month after the service of notice" to quit "on the tenant." In the present case a notice claiming a new lease was duly served by the tenant within that time. Then comes s. 5 (2) on which the present controversy centres, and, so far as material, it provides that:

"Where such a notice is so served, the tribunal, on application being made for the purpose either by the landlord or by the tenant not less than nine months before the termination of the tenancy, or, where the tenancy is terminated by notice, within two months after the service of the notice, may . . . order the grant of a new tenancy . . ."

It will be seen that there are three references to notices. The first reference is to the notice served by the tenant under s. 5 (1) claiming a new lease; the second is to the notice terminating the tenancy served on the tenant by the landlord; and the third, which gives rise to the difficulty, occurs in the phrase: "within two months after the service of the notice." Is the mention there made of "the notice" intended to refer to the notice claiming a new lease served by the tenant under s. 5 (1) or to the notice terminating the tenancy served by the landlord?

A Construing the words according to their ordinary, grammatical meaning in the order in which they appear, I find it impossible to understand the reference to "the notice" in the phrase, "within two months after the service of the notice," as a reference to anything other than the landlord's notice to determine the tenancy. That is the notice last previously mentioned, and, to my mind, nothing short of a gymnastic feat of construction could carry the reference back, over the intervening mention of the landlord's notice determining the tenancy, to the reference to the notice served by the tenant claiming a new lease which appears at the beginning of the sub-section. Were it not for the contrary view formed by the learned deputy county court judge and the conflict between the views expressed in MERLIN'S LANDLORD AND TENANT ACT, 1927, 3rd ed., p. 41, on the one hand, and CHESHIRE'S MODERN REAL PROPERTY, 5th ed., p. 175, on the other, I would find the point clear beyond argument. I should add that the natural construction of the sub-section, as I have stated it, is strongly supported by the occurrence of the same formula—though in inverted order—as is used in s. 4 (1), and, with variations, in s. 1 (1) of the Act. The conclusion is irresistible that s. 5 (2) is here intended to prescribe the same starting point for the period of time therein allowed as is prescribed for the purposes of the original claim under s. 4 (1).

D The point is not one which is capable of any great elaboration. Giving the matter the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that the construction placed on s. 5 (2) by the deputy county court judge cannot be supported, and that, on the true construction of the sub-section, the period of two months within which the application to the court must be made ran from the date of the service on the tenant of the notice to quit, with the result that the tenant's application to the tribunal was out of time. One reaches a conclusion of this kind with some regret, for it is never very satisfactory that a possibly meritorious claim should be excluded merely because the claimant has inadvertently allowed the time to expire, but, where a statute confers a right and stipulates that it must be exercised within a prescribed period, that period must be observed, and, in the absence of any provision in the Act allowing the time limit to be relaxed, failure to observe the prescribed period must inevitably be fatal to the claim. For these reasons, in my judgment, this appeal should be allowed.

H
SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I am of the same opinion. I think that the geographical position, so to speak, in which the words which we have to construe are found in the sub-section essentially produce the result that the word "notice," where used for the third time, refers to the notice mentioned on the second occasion, that is, the notice determining the tenancy. In my judgment, the arguments which counsel for the tenant has put forward, including the reference to the "serving" of the notice in the relevant passage, and the arguments founded on s. 6, are not of sufficient gravity to displace what I regard as the natural, and, indeed, inevitable, construction of the language used. As regards the second point mentioned by the learned deputy county court judge, that in case of doubt the Act of 1927 should be construed in favour of the tenant, I cannot derive much assistance from it. Assuming there is ambiguity and assuming, as is no doubt a fact, that applications under this sub-section would normally be made by a tenant, nevertheless, on its language, the sub-section intends to provide for application either by the landlord or the tenant. In this particular case it is the tenant who suffers by his failure, as I hold, to give notice in time, but there might be a case in which a landlord was desirous of making application, and, that being so, there appears to me to be no room for the application of the principle which the learned deputy county court judge invoked, even if the conditions were such as to allow its invocation.

As regards the question of extending time, counsel for the landlord referred us to the decision of the Divisional Court in Donegal Tweed Co., Ltd. v. Stephenson (1), and counsel for the tenant has not been able to put forward any argument that the court has power to extend the time where the applicant landlord or tenant, as the case may be, has failed to observe the time limit prescribed by the Act. ASQUITH, L.J., who is unable now to be present, has authorised me to say that he agrees with the judgments which have been delivered.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and McNair, JJ.), October 16, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Corroboration—Direction to jury—Need for judge to refer to evidence relied on as corroboration.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted at Yorkshire (West Riding) Quarter Sessions of an indecent assault on an elderly woman and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. The prosecution alleged that the offence had been committed when the appellant called at the woman's house to sell bandages. The appellant denied the allegation. In his summing-up the chairman told the jury of the desirability of corroboration, warned them of the danger of convicting in the absence of corroboration, and told them what was meant in law by corroboration, but he did not point out to them any piece of evidence which was capable in law of amounting to corroboration.

The appeal, which was based on the ground, inter alia, that no adequate direction with regard to corroboration had been given to the jury, was dismissed. THE COURT held that in a case where corroboration was to be sought as a matter of either law or practice, provided that the judge had given to the jury an adequate warning on corroboration and had explained to them what was meant in law by corroboration, he was not under the further duty of pointing out to them pieces of evidence which could amount to corroboration. If a judge pointed to a piece of evidence as capable as a matter of law of amounting to corroboration and it turned out that it was not so capable, that might, of course, amount to a misdirection which would result in the conviction being quashed.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Byrne, J.), November 10, 1950.]

Divorce—Maintenance—Undertaking by husband to pay yearly allowance—Forbearance by wife to apply for order for maintenance—Enforcement of undertaking.

Contract—Promise made with intention to create legal relationship—Enforcement—Unequivocal acceptance of liability—Intention that promisee will act on promise—Promise acted on.

A wife, petitioner in divorce proceedings, instructed her solicitors to apply for an order for permanent maintenance in the event of a decree nisi being granted to her. The decree nisi was granted on Feb. 1, 1943, and on Feb. 9, 1943, the wife's solicitors wrote to the husband's solicitors asking them to confirm that with regard to permanent maintenance the husband was prepared to make the wife an allowance of £100 a year free of income tax. The husband's solicitors replied that he had agreed to allow her that sum. When those letters passed and subsequently the wife, knowing that the husband was not in a good financial position, refrained from applying to the court for an order for permanent maintenance, but in 1950, the husband having fallen into arrears with the payments, she brought an action against him for the amount of the arrears.

HELD: the correspondence between the solicitors disclosed an undertaking by the husband which was intended to be binding and to be acted on, and was, in fact, acted on by the wife; there had, therefore, been an unequivocal acceptance of liability by the husband; and he was liable for the arrears.

ACTION for arrears of annual sums claimed to be due under the terms of an undertaking entered into by the defendant.

On Feb. 1, 1943, the plaintiff obtained a decree nisi against the defendant, her husband. In view of an undertaking given by the husband's solicitors on his behalf that he would pay her £100 a year free of income tax by quarterly instalments of £25 each and knowing that he was not in a good financial position, the wife forbore to apply for an order for permanent maintenance and took no other steps regarding that matter until May, 1950, when, the husband being in arrear with the payments, she brought the present action to enforce the terms of the undertaking. It was contended on behalf of the husband that the undertaking was unenforceable because it was not supported by consideration. The wife contended that the undertaking constituted an unequivocal acceptance of liability intended to be binding and to be acted on, and that by her forbearance it had been acted on, and was, therefore, enforceable. The facts appear in the judgment.

P. A. G. Rawlinson for the plaintiff.

Kee for the defendant.

BYRNE, J.: The wife's case is that the husband, after the decree nisi had been made, agreed to pay her an allowance at the rate of £100 per annum free of income tax, and that as a result of that agreement she forbore from applying to the court, which she had a perfect right to do, for an order for permanent maintenance. Her contention is that the promise made by the husband was intended to create a legal relationship between herself and him, that that promise was acted on by her to his knowledge, and that it was a valid promise binding on him.

In December, 1942, the wife instructed her solicitors to apply for permanent maintenance in the event of the decree being obtained. There came into existence two letters, the first being dated Feb. 9, 1943, from the wife's solicitors to the husband's solicitors. In the last paragraph of that letter the plaintiff's solicitors say:

"With regard to permanent maintenance, we understand that your client is prepared to make [the wife] an allowance of £100 per year free of income tax. Will you confirm this."

The second letter is dated Feb. 19, 1943, and is from the husband's solicitors to the wife's solicitors in reply to the letter of Feb. 9, and in the last paragraph, dealing with the question of maintenance, they say:

"The respondent has agreed to allow your client £100 per annum free of tax."

When those letters passed, the husband was in the army, and was not very well off. The wife was aware of that. She knew also that ultimately the husband went on half pay, and later was discharged from the army on medical grounds. Knowing that he was not in a very good financial position, she took no steps with regard to permanent maintenance, but allowed the matter to rest as it was. The matter was in abeyance from August, 1944, until May, 1945, and there was another gap between June, 1945, and May, 1950, when the wife decided to press her claim and this action was instituted.

By the letter of Feb. 9, 1943, the wife's solicitors were pointing out that they understood that the husband was willing to pay permanent maintenance at the rate of £100 a year free of income tax, and by their letter of Feb. 19, his solicitors were agreeing to that on his behalf. It is contended by counsel for the husband that this was nudum pactum. Further, he submits that, even if there were to be read into the agreement an implied term that the wife, in consideration of the payment, would not apply for permanent maintenance, that would not be a consideration which would enable her to succeed in this action. In support of his argument counsel cited Gaisberg v. Storr (1), in which a wife had petitioned for divorce in respect of her husband's adultery and also for alimony pendente lite, and the husband had signed a document or agreement saying:

"I . . . agree and undertake to pay to my wife . . . the sum of £3 per week alimony as from the date of the decree nisi being pronounced in these proceedings."

The husband paid his wife £2 10s. under a separation agreement of a date earlier than the petition for divorce until the date of decree nisi, and £3 a week pursuant to the undertaking contained in the document from the date of the decree nisi up to the date when the decree was made absolute and thereafter until his former wife re-married about eleven months after the date of the decree absolute. He then ceased making any payment to his wife, who claimed payment of £3 a week under her former husband's undertaking. It was held that the only consideration moving from the wife for the husband's undertaking which could be deduced by inference from the circumstances was an undertaking by the wife not to apply to the court for alimony pendente lite or for permanent maintenance, but that any promise by the wife to refrain from so applying was void and unenforceable.

At first sight that would appear to be conclusive, but counsel for the wife pointed out that the whole matter to which the court was directing its attention in Gaisberg v. Storr (1) was whether forbearance to apply for permanent maintenance was good consideration. In the present case, however, counsel for the wife says that it is not suggested that there was an implied term that the wife would not apply for permanent maintenance in consideration of the husband's making her an allowance of £100 a year. What is said is that a promise was made by the husband for the purpose of making an arrangement about maintenance, that he intended to be bound by it and knew that it was going to be acted upon by the wife, and that the evidence demonstrates that the wife acted on it.

In those circumstances counsel says that the law applicable is to be found in three cases which he has cited. The first is Central London Property Trust, Ltd. v. High Trees House, Ltd. (2), in which DENNING, J., reviewed the law with regard to the circumstances in which a promise is made with the intention of creating a legal relationship—a promise that is intended to be acted on, and a promise which is acted on. The learned judge put the law very simply, and, if I may say so with great respect, very succinctly, in another case, viz., Robertson v. Minister of Pensions (3), where, after dealing with the facts, he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 769):

“What then is the result in law? If this was a question between subjects, a person who gave such an assurance as that contained in the War Office letter would be held bound by it unless he could show that it was made under the influence of a mistake or induced by a misrepresentation or the like, none of which appears here. There are many cases in the books which establish that an unequivocal acceptance of liability will be enforced if it is intended to be binding, intended to be acted on, and is, in fact, acted on. I may instance the cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the latest of which is Pease & Partners, Ltd. v. Birch (4). These cases are often not cases of estoppel in the strict sense, because estoppel strictly only applies to representations of facts, not of law. Here all the primary facts were known to both parties and the only question was: what was the proper conclusion to be drawn from them?”

In another case, Bob Guinness, Ltd. v. Salomonsen (5), DENNING, J., once more stated that proposition of law.

It appears to me that the present case comes exactly within the words used by DENNING, J., in Robertson v. Minister of Pensions (3), that is to say, there is in the present case an unequivocal acceptance of liability. It seems to me to be hopeless to suggest that the two letters which passed between the solicitors contained anything other than something which was intended to be binding. As regards the question whether the agreement was intended to be acted on, it is very difficult to imagine that if parties reach the conclusion which is arrived at in those two letters, they can intend to do anything other than to act on the agreement arrived at.

The remaining question is whether the agreement was acted on? In the present case that is made clear by the evidence of the wife who has acted with great forbearance throughout, and, knowing the financial position of the husband, she has not, for a number of years, applied to the court for permanent maintenance.

In my view, she is entitled to succeed on the principles of law which were stated by DENNING, J., in the cases referred to, and she is entitled to recover the arrears of the amount which the husband undertook to pay her.

GILLOOLY v. GILLOOLY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Singleton and Birkett, L.JJ.), October 31, November 1, 1950.]

Divorce—Discretion—Lack of frankness—Incomplete disclosure in first statement C —Complete confession in second statement and in court.

Divorce—Appeal—Court of Appeal—Undefended petition by husband—Right of wife to appear in Court of Appeal.

APPEAL by the husband against the order of His Honour JUDGE RHODES sitting as divorce commissioner, dated June 21, 1950, dismissing the husband's petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's desertion. D

The petition was undefended. The commissioner found the desertion proved, but he refused to exercise his discretion in the husband's favour on the ground that the husband had shown lack of frankness. In his first discretion statement the husband had disclosed various acts of adultery, but he did not mention his adultery with a German woman. In his second discretion statement he admitted that he was the father of a child born to this woman in June, 1950, and said that he intended to marry her. The husband appealed, and on being served with the notice of appeal the wife entered a memorandum of appearance limited to the appeal. The case is reported on two points only—(i) the right of a spouse who has not defended a divorce petition to appear as respondent to an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and (ii) the exercise of the discretion of the court where a full confession is made after an incomplete one. Wilmers for the husband.

Cridlan for the wife. G

BUCKNILL, L.J.: After the husband's legal advisers had served on the wife a notice of appeal, her solicitors prepared the usual memorandum of appearance by a wife respondent. The Divorce Registry refused to accept it in its ordinary form because she had not appeared at the hearing, and the memorandum of appearance was altered to make it an appearance only in regard to the appeal. If the matter rested on the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, I should have considerable difficulty in saying that a wife who acted as the wife did in this case had any right to argue on the husband's appeal, but I think the matter is made clear by the Rules of the Supreme Court which apply to the Divorce Court except in so far as they are amended by, or are in direct variance with, the Matrimonial Causes Rules. By R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 1: H

"All appeals to the Court of Appeal shall be by way of re-hearing . . ."

By r. 2:

"The notice of appeal shall be served upon all parties directly affected by the appeal . . ."

A notice of appeal was quite properly served on the wife. The fact that she had not appeared did not take her out of the category of a "party." In Re Evans (1),

A LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1893] 1 Ch. 264):

"The defendant has not appeared, and it has been contended that he therefore is not a party to the action; but I think that he became such when he was served."

The wife in this case was served with the petition and with the notice of appeal.

B Is she directly affected? She is still the husband's wife and does not cease to be so until the decree absolute is made. The result of this appeal, if successful, will be that a decree nisi may be made against her followed by a decree absolute and she will cease to be a wife and to have the rights which she has as a wife. It is quite impossible to argue that she is not a party directly affected by the appeal. I think, therefore, that we were right in allowing counsel for the wife to

C address us on the merits.

The learned judge, in his judgment, said:

"The husband puts in a discretion statement which he knew was untrue and which he cannot explain by saying that he overlooked the fact of the later adultery. The second discretion statement, in which the later adultery is disclosed, would appear to give the reason for his seeking the dissolution of the marriage—so that he may marry the girl who is about to bear a child of which he is the father. I have but little doubt that that was really the reason of his seeking for a dissolution of his marriage, and that he kept it back, not because, as he said, he overlooked it, but because he determined not to be frank. . . . Where the court is asked to exercise its discretion in favour of the petitioner the discretion statement . . . must be a frank one.

E I have no hesitation in refusing to exercise my discretion in favour of the petitioner.

I think that the learned judge fell into two errors. It is frankness at the hearing which is required of the petitioner. If he tries to deceive the court at the hearing, there may be good reason for refusing to grant him a decree, but in this case

F there was no concealment by the husband at the hearing. It is true that when he filed his first statement he made no reference to the German girl, but he corrected that in the later statement. I think that the judge has been too hard in refusing the husband a decree merely because in his first statement he tried to conceal his association with this girl whom he hoped to marry and whose name, no doubt, he wished to keep out of court. Also, in my opinion, the judge

G failed to take into account the important considerations which were enumerated by LORD SIMON, L.C., in Blunt v. Blunt ([1943] 2 All E.R. 78) with regard to the exercise of the discretion. If he had done so, I feel sure he would have granted a decree. This appeal should be allowed and a decree nisi granted to the husband, but we should order that the décreé nisi be not made absolute until two months from to-day.

H SINGLETON, L.J., and BIRKETT, L.J., concurred.

GREENHALGH v. ARDERNE CINEMAS, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.J.J.), November 8, 9, 10, 1950.]

Company—Private company—Articles of association—Fraud on minority shareholders—Restriction on transfer of shares—Special resolution enabling sale to outsiders with sanction of an ordinary resolution—Impeachment—Discrimination between majority and minority shareholders—Intention of voters—Sale price of majority holding to be paid partly out of assets of company.

A., Ltd. was a private limited company of which the capital consisted of certain preference shares and 205,000 ordinary shares of 2s. each. All the ordinary shares were issued, 155,000 being fully paid up, and 50,000 (held by J.M. the managing director of A., Ltd., A., and H. as nominees of T.C., Ltd.) partly paid up. Of the fully paid up ordinary shares, J.M. held five hundred, his aunt D. held 30,620, his father 23,690, his wife 27,500, and T., the secretary of A., Ltd., 3,505—85,815 shares in all. The articles of association of A., Ltd. provided, by art. 10, that a member could sell his shares to another member by private arrangement, but otherwise in order to sell he must give notice to the company and the shares would be offered to other members, pro rata, at a price fixed by the auditors. Any shares not taken up could then be sold to non-members, subject to the directors' right to refuse registration. In June, 1948, J.M. agreed with S. (who then held no shares in A., Ltd.) to arrange for S. to acquire the shares in A., Ltd. which J.M. controlled (i.e., those in the names of himself and his relatives and those held by T.C., Ltd.) numbering 135,815, at 6s. a share. It was agreed that the existing board of directors should resign and that S. should pay no compensation to them but should "request the company to pay [J.M.] the sum of £5,000 for [J.M.] to resign" which sum J.M. agreed to accept. To effectuate his bargain (having regard to the restrictions on transfer contained in the articles), J.M. arranged for an extraordinary general meeting of A., Ltd. to be called for the purpose of passing this special resolution: "That the articles of association of the company be altered by adding at the end of art. 10 the following additional clause: 'Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this article any member may with the sanction of an ordinary resolution passed at any general meeting of the company transfer his shares or any of them to any person named in such resolution as the proposed transferee, and the directors shall be bound to register any transfer which has been so sanctioned.'"

The special resolution was passed, and an ordinary resolution was later passed sanctioning the sale to S. A minority shareholder, G., sought to impeach the transaction with S. on the ground that the interests of the minority had, by means of the special resolution, been sacrificed to the interests of the majority shareholders without any reasonable prospect of advantage to A., Ltd., and a fraud on the minority was thereby constituted. The £5,000 agreed to be paid to J.M. was to be divided among three persons (H. and T., and a Mrs. Q. who was not a shareholder) who were servants of A., Ltd. or T.C., Ltd.

HELD: (i) the £5,000 was part of the purchase price which S. was to pay for the control of the company, and, although the purchase price was to that extent agreed to be paid out of the assets of the company, it did not follow that the special resolution was a fraud on the minority, and, even if the majority vote were analysed on the basis that the vote could be invalidated if some or one of the voters (having a large number of votes) were tainted in some way, it appeared that H. had voted correctly as nominee of T.C., Ltd., T.'s holding was insignificant, and no other voters received a benefit that all could not have had.

(ii) although a special resolution would be liable to be impeached if its effect were to discriminate between the majority shareholders and the minority shareholders so as to give to the former an advantage of which the latter were deprived, it was not necessary that the voters should dissociate themselves altogether from the prospect of personal benefit as a result of the passing of the resolution and consider merely whether the proposal was for the benefit of the company as a going concern.

(iii) merely because it was not directed to a single transaction, the special resolution did not prejudice the minority shareholders, because they were in no worse position in regard to obtaining leave to sell to any purchaser than they would have been, having regard to directors' power to refuse registration, had it not been passed, and, although the resolution deprived the minority of their right of pre-emption under the articles, a shareholder had no right to assume that the company's articles would always remain in a particular form and he could not object to such an alteration as was made here as being fraudulent providing the resolution were passed bona fide and did not unfairly discriminate.

(iv) although J.M. had acted with grave indiscretion in some respects in the transaction, he had received no more than any other seller of shares to S. (who was prepared to take all the shares in A., Ltd. which any member cared to offer him at 6s. a share) and bad faith could not be imputed to him.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 5, 1950, dismissing his action for a declaration that certain resolutions passed at an extraordinary general meeting of Arderne Cinemas, Ltd., constituted a fraud on the minority shareholders of whom the plaintiff was one.

R. W. Jennings, K.C., and Lindner for the plaintiff.

Harold Christie, K.C., and Hillaby for the defendants other than the second defendant (Arderne Cinemas, Ltd., Tegarn Cinemas, Ltd., and persons interested in the majority holdings of shares, whether as nominees or beneficially).

Pennycuik, K.C., and E. B. Stamp for the second defendant, Joseph Thomas Leslie Mallard.

Counsel for the defendants were not called on to argue.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This action is one of considerable complexity, not the less so because it is, as I understand, the last (at the moment) of a series of actions which have concerned the affairs of the first defendant, Arderne Cinemas, Ltd., and represent engagements in an unfortunate warfare which has continued for a long time between Mr. Greenhalgh, the plaintiff, and those who support him, on the one hand, and Mr. Mallard, the second defendant, and those who support him, on the other. I hope without offence I may refer to the two conflicting interests as the Greenhalgh faction and the Mallard faction. I do not desire to go beyond the particular matters which are involved in this case, and, since we have not heard the defendants, it would be wrong for me to say more than is absolutely necessary about the conduct, in relation to these matters, of the leader of the Mallard faction, Mr. Mallard junior, himself. There seems no doubt, from what has been said in this case and from references to other cases, that Mr. Greenhalgh has, at any rate, grounds for saying that he has been, in regard to this company, somewhat hardly treated, and it can be, I think, stated as an assertion that he feels very strongly indeed a sense of grievance that he has been deprived of certain rights and privileges which were promised to him at a time when his aid was sought by other persons concerned with the Arderne company. He, therefore, has lost no opportunity of trying to vindicate his rights, or what he says are his rights, by this series of actions. That preliminary statement is not by any means irrelevant to the consideration of the matters here involved, because there can, I think, be no doubt whatever that Mr. Mallard, in regard to these same matters, thought fit to display towards Mr. Greenhalgh (who, like himself, was a shareholder in this company) a singular lack of courage and candour. Certain things to which I shall have to allude were well calculated to raise and bring about the head of Mr. Mallard a cloud of suspicion as to his good faith. I think fear of further litigation may well have been the main reason for the unfortunate taciturnity on Mr. Mallard's part.

It will be convenient if, first, I say something about the Arderne company. It is a private company, and its share capital now issued includes a number of preference shares which do not figure in the matter with which we are concerned. In addition, the capital includes 205,000 ordinary shares of 2s. each. One hundred and fifty-five thousand of that number have been issued and are fully paid up. The remaining 50,000 were issued in order that they might be allotted to another defendant in the action, Tegarn Cinemas, Ltd., or its nominees, and the circumstances surrounding the issue of those shares have been the subject of other proceedings. For present purposes, suffice it to say that those 50,000 are only partly paid up. The Tegarn company itself had three shareholders, Mr. Mallard junior, Mr. Mallard senior, and the penultimate defendant, Mr. Arnison, who hold their shares in the proportion of two, two, one. The 50,000 partly paid shares in the Arderne company stand in the names of Mr. Mallard junior as to 2,500, the defendant Arnison as to 22,500, and the last defendant, Gifford Hallam, as to the remaining 25,000. Neither of the last two defendants holds any shares at all in the Arderne company in his own right. They are mere nominees of the Tegarn company.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the shareholdings in the Arderne company of Mr. Mallard junior and his supporters and relatives, and continued:] Mr. Mallard junior, whom it will be convenient to refer to hereafter as the defendant Mallard (because his father is not a defendant) was at all relevant dates the chairman of the Arderne company, and, I think, also of the Tegarn company. Putting it for the moment in the briefest terms, the problem presented by this action is whether a transaction which was effected in the summer of 1948, whereby the controlling interest in the shares of the Arderne company passed to the hands of the third defendant, Sol Sheckman, can be successfully impeached by Mr. Greenhalgh on the ground that, in the circumstances of the case, the resolutions, and, particularly, the special resolution, passed on June 30, 1948, were such that the interests of the minority of the shareholders (which means, for present purposes, the Greenhalgh faction) were sacrificed to the interests of the majority without any, or any reasonable, prospect of advantage to the Arderne company or its minority shareholders and constituted a fraud on that minority.

I will next proceed to state briefly the narrative which ended with the passing of the resolutions impugned. By a letter of Apr. 23, 1948, written by the defendant Mallard to the defendant Sheckman, the matter is stated thus:

"My solicitor suggests that after a basic agreement is reached between us, you, your accountant and your solicitor meet myself and accountant in my solicitor's office and draft heads of agreement. I want to repeat that after agreeing on price and terms, etc., I want to have an indemnity from you that you will not tie up with Greenhalgh in any scheme to start a law suit against me or my co-directors, which, if I still held control of the shares of the company, I could stop. The issued ordinary share capital of Arderne is 205,000 shares . . . My control is 135,815. There are a number of small shareholders whose combined holding is 24,972 2s. shares. Most, or all, of these will want to be sold along with mine, but I am not approaching them until final details are settled between us. If you would like a bigger control than this, you can have the share capital increased by any amount you like, the whole of the new shares being allotted to you at par."

On Apr. 30 Mr. Sheckman wrote in response to that letter:

"I note from the final paragraph that you hope to be able to acquire and turn over to me 160,787 shares of the above company, and confirm that we have agreed to-day the price of these shares will be 6s. per 2s. share."

The last letter I want to read was written on the same day, also by Mr. Sheckman to Mr. Mallard, and it says:

"With reference to the discussions between us, I confirm that in the event of us acquiring control of the above company we will require the whole of the existing board, including you, to resign their respective offices. I have agreed that I am not prepared to pay compensation to any of the directors, but in respect to your office I am prepared to request the company to pay you the sum of £5,000 for you to resign, which sum you have agreed to accept."

I have read those letters not only because something turns on the particular matters in them, but also because they sufficiently adumbrate the deal that the defendant Mallard was negotiating with Mr. Sheckman. The matter had obviously reached the stage of accord, and so I can turn at once to the three more formal agreements in which the arrangement was precisely set forth. The parties to these agreements were the defendant Mallard, as vendor, and the defendant Sheckman, as purchaser. The most important for the present purpose is that which related to the Arderne shares. These agreements are dated June 4, 1948, though it is probable that they were not executed until, perhaps, three weeks later.

The agreement as regards Arderne, after recitals which are not pertinent, states in the fourth of such recitals:

"The vendor [the defendant Mallard] by himself and others owns and/or controls 85,815 of the said ordinary shares of 2s. each . . . and 50,000 ordinary shares partly paid registered in the names of Arnison and Hallam but belonging to Tegarn Cinemas, Ltd."

The operative part of the agreement is an agreement by the vendor to sell or procure the sale of the 85,815 fully paid ordinary shares which have been identified. It is convenient to interpolate that the second of the agreements relates to the sale of the assets and undertaking of the Tegarn company. By that means Mr. Sheckman acquired the Tegarn company as an undertaking and thereby, incidentally, became the proprietor of the 50,000 partly paid shares. The other paragraph in the first agreement to which I want to refer is that numbered 5 (a). It provides:

"The purchaser hereby undertakes and binds himself to procure that within four weeks of the completion of the sale and registration of the transfer of the said minimum number of shares (sixty-seven per cent.) to him the company shall pay to the vendor the sum of £5,000 as compensation for loss of office as managing director of the company."

[His LORDSHIP referred to the restrictions on the transfer of shares contained in art. 10 of the articles of association of the Arderne company and stated the facts relating to the resolutions passed by the company to effectuate the agreements with Mr. Sheckman, and continued:] As will be seen from what I have said, the defendant Mallard obtained an assurance from Sheckman that Sheckman would indemnify him in any action and he also made it clear that he did not propose to disclose to the Greenhalgh faction a single word of this transaction more than was absolutely necessary. In addition to those steps, the defendant Mallard carefully prepared a speech, which he delivered to the shareholders of the Arderne company on the occasion of the passing of the resolution. He discussed at some length the problems which were then confronting the cinema trade, and the relevant part at the end of the speech is:

"The price we have been offered for our ordinary shares is 6s. per 2s. share, and we have worked it out that, if the dividend stays as it is and income tax stays as it is, we are getting our own money back plus twenty-four years net dividend. It is because of this fact that my family and friends desire to sell their shares. As you know, I haven't many shares and I shall be losing my office. Mr. Sheckman has promised me that, if I do go, I shall receive £5,000 compensation for loss of office. The present board of directors will, of course, cease and be replaced by Mr. Sheckman and his associates. If any member here wishes to sell, Mr. Sheckman has offered to buy his or her shares at the same price, namely, 6s. per 2s. share, provided notice is given . . . "

Mr. Greenhalgh had obviously divined that something was in the wind before this occurred, because he served a notice of his intention to transfer one hundred shares at 10s., and the result was that the auditor said he thought a fair value was 4s. 6d. That is, I think, a relevant fact in considering Mr. Sheckman's 6s. Of course, I do not wish Mr. Greenhalgh to suppose that I do not fully understand that if you want to get control you may well have to pay more than the fair value of the individual shares. However, Mr. Greenhalgh attended the meeting, and, apparently, a certain amount of commotion occurred. He asked questions, and Mr. Mallard, so far as he could, I gather, avoided answering them. Certainly he did not give many good answers. Particularly, it is said against him that the statement that he would receive £5,000 for loss of office failed to disclose that it was part of the bargain that it was not Sheckman but the Arderne company that was going to pay the £5,000 at the instigation of Mr. Sheckman. It follows that, if Mr. Greenhalgh did not sell, he would himself contribute, in a sense, to that £5,000, though his contribution would not amount to more than about £10. The defendant Mallard further forebore to disclose that it was part of the arrangement that Mr. Sheckman was buying the assets of the Tegarn company so that he would, in that capacity, be able to vote in respect of 50,000 Tegarn shares. Why that was withheld I cannot understand, but it was. The resolution was passed by the requisite majority, and on the following day the writ was issued.

Put in its briefest form, the effect presented by the judgment is, if I may say so with all possible respect to ROXBURGH, J., a little disconcerting at first sight, because he found as a fact that the scheme enshrined in the agreements I have mentioned was a scheme to commit a fraud on the minority. He said that if the defendant Mallard controlled a majority of the shares, it would follow that the special resolution operated to effect a fraud on the minority. He passed then to consider whether Mallard in truth controlled the majority in a sense which made it equivalent to ownership, and he came to no conclusion on that because he stated that, assuming it were so, the matter which made all this a fraud on the minority, viz., the payment of the £5,000, was not pleaded, and on that ground he dismissed the action. With every respect to the judge, I can well understand that that conclusion would leave Mr. Greenhalgh feeling uncertain and aggrieved. I think that the learned judge was right in saying that this matter of the £5,000 was not pleaded. I think that, when this pleading was amended, as it was after the trial, then if the claim which was going to be the main plank in the plaintiff's platform was the impropriety connected with this £5,000, it should assuredly have been pleaded, whereas in fact, I think it was, by inference, really negatived as a ground of attack.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the statement of claim, and continued:] I would be most unwilling on the ground that the matter was not pleaded to deprive Mr. Greenhalgh of the rights to which he would be entitled on the footing that the £5,000 vitiated the transaction—though I wish to make it clear that, in a case in which bad faith is alleged, the office of the statement of claim is to state in unmistakable terms the charge which the defendant has to meet. On examination, I have come to the conclusion that this claim cannot (apart from any pleading point) be sustained on the basis of the £5,000 transaction. I must observe, and it is only fair to the defendant Mallard that this should be said, that the judge used this language:

“I do not think that either Mr. Sheckman or Mr. Mallard, in dealing with this matter as they did, were guilty of anything in the nature of deliberate dishonesty.”

He says that they forgot the distinction between the company as such and Sheckman, the buyer of the shares. The learned judge observed that the £5,000 was part of the price which Sheckman was willing to pay to gain control, and was a sum of money which the defendant Mallard, from quite disinterested motives, was insisting on as part of the price for selling the control. I do not feel any hesitation in holding that the real transaction was that this £5,000 was part of the purchase price which Sheckman was to pay for the passing of the control, but I do not think it follows that, if this was part of the purchase price for the passing of the control, it would, therefore, be a fraud on a dissentient minority because it was contemplated that that part of the purchase price would come out of the assets of the company.

It is to be observed that there is here no question in the judge's mind of dishonesty. Technically, he is saying, the making of the £5,000 payable out of the company's assets amounted to a fraud on the minority because it was a deprivation of an interest the minority had in the assets. With all respect, I doubt the validity, as a general proposition, of that conclusion. I think it may well be that, if objection is made, this £5,000 cannot be paid out of the company's assets. In fact, it has not been paid, and it may well be that, if what I have said is right, Mr. Sheckman will have to pay it himself. It does not matter very much one way or the other, in the circumstances. It may be proper that some part of the £5,000 should be paid by the company, but in any case I am not satisfied that the promise of Mr. Sheckman to provide this sum of £5,000 in the way he did operates, in all the circumstances, in such a way and with such emphasis that one can say that this was an unfair discrimination. Even if the agreements could, for the technical reasons stated, be regarded as agreements to commit a fraud on the minority, it does not, in my judgment, follow that the passing of the special resolution altering the articles falls by the same disorder. In truth, I venture to think there has been some misapprehension about this £5,000.

I will assume, in the plaintiff's favour, that you can analyse the majority votes, and if you find some, or, perhaps, even one, of its big enough voters tainted in some way as regards the casting of his vote, that may operate to invalidate the whole of the resolution, but it is not necessary to pursue this rather interesting topic in its most extreme form, as posed by JENKINS, L.J. ROXBURGH, J., applied himself, in this connection, to the position of Hallam. Hallam was the recipient of £2,000, but he had, himself, no beneficial interest in any share in the Arderne company. He was a mere nominee of Tegarn. He was asked in the course of his evidence whether he was ever instructed how to vote in respect of those shares, to which he replied, “No, there were only three directors. I knew perfectly well what they desired done, and I did it.” Therefore, although it is true that Mr. Hallam was going to receive £2,000, it is plain, to my mind, that that fact was wholly irrelevant and could not in the least degree affect how he voted the Tegarn shares, which he had to vote as the Tegarn company desired to vote, whether he received £2,000 or not. Another £2,000 went to Mrs. Quinlan, who was not a shareholder at all. There only remains Titterton. Assuming everything else in the plaintiff's favour, Titterton's shareholding of three thousand odd shares is insignificant for the purpose in hand, and whatever can be said of the claim for compensation of Hallam, Titterton was, at least, one who, according to the evidence, had a claim of some sort for compensation, because the arrangement Mr. Sheekman insisted on would involve Mr. Titterton's retirement as secretary. He was going to lose in salary, as he, in fact, has. I think he has been re-appointed as an assistant secretary, but at a less remuneration. For those reasons, I cannot see that the £5,000 has any bearing on the question we have to decide. If it could be said that, to use ASQUITH, L.J.'s phrase, the bread of certain shareholders had been buttered in this way, then one could, no doubt, have said that there was a lack of good faith, that the voter was voting for a private gain, and on that ground impeach the resolution, but, for the reasons I have stated, I do not think it is possible to impeach this resolution by reliance on the £5,000, or the part that it played at all in the hands of the defendant Mallard, on the one hand, or of the three actual beneficiaries, on the other.

I now come to the case as it has been presented in this court. I have stated that the burden of the case is that the resolution was not passed bona fide and in the interests of the company as a whole, and there are, as counsel for the plaintiff has urged, two rather distinct approaches. The first line of attack is one to which, counsel complains, ROXBURGH, J., paid no regard. This is a special resolution, and, on authority, counsel says, the validity of a special resolution depends on the fact that those who passed it did so in good faith and for the benefit of the company as a whole. The cases to which counsel referred are Sidebotham v. Kershaw, Leese & Co. (2); the decision of PETERSON, J., in Dafen Tinplate Co. v. Llanelly Steel Co. (3); and, finally, Shuttleworth v. Cox Bros. & Co. (Maidenhead), Ltd. (4). Certain things, I think, can be safely stated as emerging from those authorities. In the first place, it is now plain that "bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole" means not two things but one thing. It means that the shareholder must proceed on what, in his honest opinion, is for the benefit of the company as a whole. Secondly, the phrase, "the company as a whole," does not (at any rate in such a case as the present) mean the company as a commercial entity as distinct from the corporators. (It means the corporators as a general body. That is to say, you may take the case of an individual hypothetical member and ask whether what is proposed is, in the honest opinion of those who voted in its favour, for that person's benefit. I think the thing can, in practice, be more accurately and precisely stated by looking at the converse and by saying that a special resolution of this kind would be liable to be impeached if the effect of it were to discriminate between the majority shareholders and the minority shareholders so as to give to the former an advantage of which the latter were deprived.) When the cases are examined where the resolution has been successfully attacked, it is on that ground that it has fallen down. It is, therefore, not necessary to require that persons voting for a special resolution should, so to speak, dissociate themselves altogether from the prospect of personal benefit and consider whether the proposal is for the benefit of the company as a going concern. If, as commonly happens, an outside person makes an offer to buy all the shares, prima facie, if the corporators think it is a fair offer and vote in favour of the resolution, it is no ground for impeaching the resolution because they are considering the position of themselves as individual persons.

But, accepting all that, as I think counsel for the plaintiff did, he said that there are still grounds for impeaching this resolution—first, because when you look at it the resolution goes further than was necessary to give effect to the sale of the shares, and, secondly, because it prejudiced the plaintiff and minority shareholders in that it deprived them of the right which, under the subsisting articles, they would have of buying the shares of the majority if the latter desired to dispose of them. Counsel says that if you pass a resolution altering the articles merely to give effect to a particular transaction, it is quite sufficient (and generally is the case) to limit it to that transaction, but this resolution provides that anybody who wants at any time to sell his shares can go direct to an outsider, provided that there is an ordinary resolution of the company approving the proposed transferee. He says that if it is one of the majority who is selling, of course he will get the resolution. It, so to speak, franks the shares for holders of majority interests, but makes it more difficult for a minority shareholder, because the majority will probably look with disfavour on his choice. But, after all, this is merely a relaxation of the very stringent restrictions on transfer in the existing article, and it is to be borne in mind that the directors, as the articles stood, could always refuse to register a transfer. A minority shareholder, therefore, who produced an outsider was always liable to be met by the directors (who presumably act according to the majority view), saying: "We are sorry, but we will not have this man in." Although I follow the point, and it might, perhaps, have been possible to do it the other way, I think this is very far removed from the type of case in which what is proposed, as in the Dafen case (3), is to give a majority the right to expropriate a minority shareholder, whether he wanted to sell or not, merely on the ground that the majority shareholders wanted the minority man's shares.

As to the second point, I felt at one time sympathy for the plaintiff's argument, because, after all, as the articles stood Mr. Greenhalgh could have said: "Before you go selling to Mr. Sheckman you have to offer your shares to the existing shareholders, and that will enable me, if I feel so disposed, to buy in, in effect, the whole of the shareholding of the Arderne company." I think the answer to that is that, when a man comes into a company, he is not entitled to assume that the articles will always remain in a particular form, and, so long as the proposed alteration does not unfairly discriminate in the way I have already indicated, I do not think it is an objection, provided the resolution is bona fide passed, that the right to tender for the majority holding of shares would be lost by the lifting of the restriction. I do not think it can be said that that is such a discrimination as falls within the scope of the principle I have tried to state.

Then, says counsel for the plaintiff: If that is wrong, I fall back on my other point, that the defendant Mallard acted in bad faith. He concealed all these matters to which I refer. He confessed to feelings of envy and hatred against Mr. Greenhalgh. He desired to do something to spite Mr. Greenhalgh, even if he cut off his own nose in the process. Following the judge's line of reasoning, it is said that the defendant Mallard did control all these other submissive persons who supported him, so that they are equally tainted with his bad faith. I agree with counsel that, if an ordinary shareholder chooses to give what counsel called "carte blanche" to the promoter of a scheme and that promoter is then found to have been acting in bad faith, the persons who gave him carte blanche cannot say that they exercised any independent judgment, and they would likewise be tainted with the evil of their leader. Early in his argument counsel had formulated his grounds for bad faith against the defendant Mallard at greater length, and I need not go through the several heads. Much turned at one stage on what was said about the £5,000—that it had not been disclosed before the meeting, that it was concealed at all the various stages of the transaction, the way in which it was referred to in the speech, and so on. I have already alluded to the disastrous lack of candour at the meeting of June 30 in regard to the Tegarn sale, and, counsel says: "Observe the disingenuousness of Mr. Mallard's statement, that all he had was an interest of five hundred shares in this company"—a very stupid thing to have said, as it was, I think, stupid to refrain from any mention of the Tegarn transaction. Finally, the point was made that, if you look right back to the inception of this scheme, the defendant Mallard was saying: "If there is any difficulty, although we are going to sell our shares at 6s. each, nevertheless we will issue as many more as will give you a majority and only at par." Counsel says that all these things cast such doubt on the transaction that the defendant Mallard must be taken to have been acting in bad faith. I think he acted with grave indiscretion in some respects, but the judge has said he was in no way guilty of deliberate dishonesty, and, despite all these things, I cannot see where and how it can be suggested that the defendant Mallard was grinding some particular axe of his own. He was getting 6s. a share, but he was getting no more and no less than anyone else would get who wished to sell, and I am unable and unwilling to put on the actions of the defendant Mallard, because of his unfortunate secrecy and all the rest of it, so bad a complexion as to impute bad faith in the true sense of the term, of which, indeed, ROXBURGH, J., acquitted him.

A word, lastly, about control. I think the word "control" has been used rather loosely, and I cannot see that very much turns on all this, but, for what it is worth, I will state my opinion. It is true that Hallam was controlled in a strict, true sense by the defendant Mallard in that Mallard, as the moving spirit and chairman of Tegarn, was in a position to tell Hallam how to vote and Hallam was bound so to vote, and so was the penultimate defendant, Mr. Arnison. The judge thought that the secretary was in a like situation, and we have been referred to the evidence. With respect, I have some doubt about him. There is no evidence that I can find that the defendant's aunt, his father and his former wife were so dominated and under the thumb of Mallard that they would do what he told them without demur, nor am I willing to regard the defendant Mallard, or any other defendant in this action, as estopped from asserting the contrary. I can see no basis for such a claim, and I am, therefore, unwilling to reach the conclusion that there was such a measure of domination and control that all these members of the family and friends of the defendant Mallard should be treated as mere dummies and that on that ground the matter must be regarded as though the whole of the 85,815 votes and the Tegarn votes must be treated as being Mallard's and Mallard's only. However, for reasons I have already indicated, I do not think it would make the smallest difference if they were, because, as I have said, I do not think that such a case of bad faith, in the ordinary signification of those words, has been made out against Mallard as to vitiate the resolution.

In my opinion, in spite of all these complexities, this was, in substance, an offer by an outside man to buy the shares of this company at 6s. a share from anybody who was willing to sell them. As commonly happens, the defendant Mallard, as the managing director of the company, negotiated and had to proceed on the footing that he had with him sufficient support to make the negotiation a reality. That was the substance of what was suggested. It discriminated between no types of shareholder. Any who wanted to get out at that price could get out, and any who preferred to stay in could stay in. That being the substance of the thing, and the evidence, to my mind, clearly suggesting that 6s. per share (allowing for the privilege of control) was a fair price, I can see no ground for saying that this resolution can be impeached, and I would dismiss the appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I entirely agree.

JENKINS, L.J.: I also agree.

BOWMAKER, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman and Danckwerts, JJ.), November 13, 1950.]

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Validity—Formal defect—Copy served on debtor entitled in the wrong court—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 147 (1).

A Owing to a mistake on the part of the judgment creditor's solicitor, which was not noticed by the registrar, one of the three copies of a bankruptcy notice issued out of the Windsor County Court on May 19, 1950, was entitled "In the Redhill County Court." This copy was sealed with the seal of the Windsor County Court. On May 31 the copy of the notice which was wrongly entitled was served on the debtor. On Aug. 9, the debt not having been paid, the creditors issued a bankruptcy petition against the debtor, and on Sept. 27 a receiving order was made against him.

B HELD: the mistake in the copy of the bankruptcy notice served on the debtor was one which could have misled him, and, therefore, it was not a formal defect or irregularity which could be remedied under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 147 (1), and, as a result the notice was bad, the petition founded on it failed in limine, and the receiving order should be rescinded.

APPEAL by the debtor from an order of the registrar of the Windsor County Court, made on Sept. 27, 1950, whereby he made a receiving order against the debtor.

G The bankruptcy notice was issued out of the Windsor County Court, but, owing to an oversight, the copy served on the debtor was wrongly entitled "In the Redhill County Court," although it was sealed with the seal of the Windsor County Court. It was contended by the debtor that the receiving order should be rescinded on the ground, inter alia, that a true copy of the bankruptcy notice had not been served on him. The facts appear in the judgment of HARMAN, J.

H C. H. Duveen for the debtor.
Jupp for the creditors.

HARMAN, J. : In 1948 the debtor purchased a fairly expensive motor-car on the hire-purchase system. He paid some comparatively small sum on account of his indebtedness, and failed to pay any more. On Sept. 30, 1948, the petitioning creditors, Bowmaker, Ltd., who were the company financing the hire-purchase, obtained judgment in the King's Bench Division of the High Court against him for the sum of £509 1s. 4d., which represented the sum which he then owed to them plus certain costs. Thereafter, the judgment debtor paid £100 of that sum, leaving £409 1s. 4d. due. As he paid no more, the creditors determined to enforce the judgment, if they could, by bankruptcy proceedings, and they instructed their solicitor to obtain the issue by the appropriate court of a bankruptcy notice to found the petition. The solicitor thought that such a notice should issue out of the Redhill County Court and prepared a notice on that footing. Finding that the Redhill County Court had no bankruptcy jurisdiction, he then repaired to the Windsor County Court, which was one of the appropriate courts for his purpose, and on May 19, 1950, a bankruptcy notice was issued by the registrar of that court.

On these occasions three copies of the notice are made. One goes on the file of the court and two are handed to the applicant, one of them to be served on the respondent and the other to be annexed to the affidavit of service which has to be filed. In issuing the three copies of the notice the registrar did not observe that the one handed in to him and on which he founded the other two was entitled "In the Redhill County Court." He entitled the other two "In the Windsor County Court." The one that went on his file had at the top of it the title "Windsor County Court." Of the two which were issued out to the creditors' solicitor, one was entitled "In the Redhill County Court" and the other "In the Windsor County Court", and, as chance would have it, on May 31 the process server served on the debtor the copy which was entitled "In the Redhill County Court."

The bankruptcy notice, assuming it to be a good notice, expired on June 8. The debtor did not take any steps about it until after it had expired. On or about June 11 he wrote to the creditors' solicitor acknowledging the receipt of the notice and asking the solicitor to let him know the latest day on which he could pay, where he had to pay, and what were the costs to be paid. Whether that was a reference to any doubt in his mind as to where he was to attend, I do not know. There is no evidence that that is so. There ensued certain further correspondence between the solicitors for the parties out of which there arises the second point argued before us. It is enough now to say that no part of the sum demanded was paid and on Aug. 9 a petition was issued, and was filed on Aug. 16 in the Windsor County Court. That petition stated the indebtedness as £409 1s. 4d. and prayed for a receiving order to be made against the debtor. On Sept. 16 notice of intention to oppose the petition was filed by the debtor's solicitors, and on Sept. 27, at the hearing of the petition, notwithstanding the objections taken on the debtor's behalf a receiving order was made against which the debtor now appeals.

The points taken before us are: (i) that a true copy of the notice was never served on the debtor, and (ii) that certain costs were demanded which were not due, and that there was extortion in the sense that, by the pressure which their solicitor had put on the debtor, there was an attempt to obtain for the creditors a collateral advantage, or an advantage to which they were not entitled in law. I propose to deal with the first point, namely, that the petition cannot be a good ground for a receiving order because it is founded on that which is invalid, viz., a bankruptcy notice which is not a true copy of the notice on the file. There is no doubt that it is not a true copy, as it is headed "In the Redhill County Court," whereas, to be a true copy, it should be headed "In the Windsor County Court." It is contended by the creditors that a mistake of this kind is covered by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 147 (1), and that the mistake is one which the court should overlook because it is a mere irregularity. Section 147 (1) provides:

"No proceeding in bankruptcy shall be invalidated by any formal defect or by any irregularity, unless the court before which an objection is made to the proceeding is of opinion that substantial injustice has been caused by the defect or irregularity, and that the injustice cannot be remedied by any order of that court."

It was suggested at one time that the defect or irregularity could be remedied by an amendment of the bankruptcy notice, but, in my judgment, that point does not really arise here, because no amendment can cure the fact that the notice which was served on the debtor, and which is the foundation of the

A petition, was not a true copy. Therefore, in my judgment, the question is merely whether this is a formal defect or an irregularity which we ought to brush aside on the ground that no substantial injustice has been done.

I do not think that the mistake in this case can be called a formal defect. It is more than that. The copy of the notice served on the debtor is, on the face of it, puzzling, because "Redhill" is mentioned at the top of it and, a few lines

B further down, is a round stamp, such as county courts put on their documents, and on which "Windsor" is mentioned. On the other hand, I seek in vain for any real evidence that an injustice has been done. If I were unconstrained by authority, I should be inclined to hold that this was a defect or irregularity which could be cured or overlooked under s. 147 (1) of the Act of 1914. The matter is, however, by no means free from authority, and it seems that a bank-

C ruptcy notice, being the document setting in motion the whole process leading to bankruptcy, which is in the nature of a criminal matter, must be strictly and narrowly construed on the footing that it is a penal matter, and it is, apparently, easier to cure a defect in a petition than in a bankruptcy notice.

In Re O.C.S., Ex p. Debtor (1), VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., who was a great authority in bankruptcy, said ([1904] 2 K.B. 162) in the course of the argument:

D "In Re Collier (2) a rule was laid down by the Divisional Court, and I think that rule has ever since been acted on. In that case CAVE, J., said [8 Morr. 83]: 'Due service of a bankruptcy notice is necessary in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy, and it is more important that the rules and regulations should be properly complied with than in the case of a petition for adjudication. When the act of bankruptcy has been committed then the

E petition is a less formal matter and one as to which it is not necessary to take exactly the same view. Very soon after [the Bankruptcy Act, 1883], came into operation several cases were brought before the court with reference to a bankruptcy notice, and on more than one occasion the Court of Appeal expressed the opinion that, since the commission of an act

F of bankruptcy was a serious matter and involved consequences of what has been called a penal nature it was important to see that the necessary preliminaries were complied with.' In that decision I concurred. I have ever since declined to allow an amendment of a bankruptcy notice, except in the case of a merely formal defect."

Those are very weighty words, and, as I have said, it does not seem to me that

G the mistake in the case now before us is a merely formal defect.

The provision which is now contained in s. 147 (1) of the Act of 1914 has been part of our bankruptcy law since 1869 [the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 82], and, consequently, one must look at the authorities to see what view the court has taken of it. There is a number of cases in which the facts are similar to, but not the same as, the facts here, and it is difficult to find one which is exactly in point.

H In Re Beach (3) and Re Threadkell (4) the amount of the debt, in each case, was not exactly stated in the bankruptcy notice, and it was held, in each case, that the mistake was fatal. It was as a result of these and similar decisions that proviso (ii), dealing with a defect of that kind, was added to s. 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

In Re A Judgment Debtor (No. 530 of 1908) (5), it was held that a bankruptcy notice was calculated to embarrass the debtor because it did not follow the terms of the judgment in that, although the judgment debt was due to two persons trading as a firm, the notice required that payment should be made to them, not in their capacity as partnership traders, but as individuals. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said ([1908] 2 K.B. 476):

"I approach this question impressed with the idea that a bankruptcy notice, which is the foundation of a bankruptcy, attended as a bankruptcy is with penal consequences, is a matter in which great strictness is required and, so far as I am aware, always has been required since the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. I need not quote authorities on that point, because that is really admitted by both sides."

Later he said (ibid., 478):

"Here I think the notice was very much more calculated to puzzle and perplex the debtor, because the debtor was told that he must pay two people when he was under no obligation to pay more than one. That does seem to me to be a substantial matter—'substantial,' I mean, in the sense in which it is right to use that word when dealing with such a technical matter as a bankruptcy notice."

BUCKLEY, L.J., dissented. KENNEDY, L.J., agreed with COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and said (ibid., 481):

"In the first place one has not to determine the validity or invalidity of the notice by considering whether the debtor to whom the notice is given has in fact been misled. It is sufficient that there is good ground for saying that the debtor might be misled. That is, I think, settled by authority. Secondly, in judging of the probability of the debtor being misled, one is bound not to deal too liberally with the requisites of the notice because of the quasi penal consequences which a bankruptcy involves. My own view is that in considering this particular notice one may take into account the position of a debtor who is not necessarily learned in the law."

At the end of his judgment KENNEDY, L.J., came to this conclusion (ibid., 483):

"Here is a possibly misleading notice, which was not in accordance with the terms of the judgment. I think we ought to follow the practice of the court in such cases and hold this notice to be invalid, although the objection to the validity may be in a sense a technical one, and although there is no evidence that the debtor was in fact actually misled."

That was a very strong case.

Re A Debtor (No. 478 of 1908) (6), where the mistake was as to the amount of interest due, is a decision to the same effect. As I have said, the law on that point is not the same now as it was then, as the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 2, proviso (ii), provides that a notice "... shall not be invalidated by reason only that the sum specified in the notice as the amount due exceeds the amount actually due ..."

unless certain conditions are fulfilled. Nevertheless, the observations of the Court of Appeal in that case are valuable although the law on the particular subject-matter has been altered. The interest had been wrongly calculated and a mistake to the amount of £1 5s. 6d. was in question. It was contended by the petitioning creditors that the principle de minimis non curat lex should be applied, but the Court of Appeal held that the mistake invalidated the notice. COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said ([1908] 2 K.B. 687) that the mistake was not a mere formal defect within s. 143 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (which was in the same terms as s. 147 (1) of the Act of 1914). FARWELL, L.J., agreed with that opinion. KENNEDY, L.J., pointed out (ibid., 691) that in Re Johnson (7), which was a decision under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 82, the mistake was obviously a clerical mistake—£24 being written for £74—because the notice went on to refer to the particulars, and the particulars stated the amount of the debt correctly. KENNEDY, L.J., said (ibid.):

A “That was a mere clerical error. It was a defect in form and not in substance, and a defect which could not mislead or embarrass the debtor, because he could see on the face of the document what was the nature of the claim and what was the amount which was really claimed from him.”

Therefore, the question is: Is this a mistake which could not possibly mislead the debtor? I am to ask myself, not whether it has misled him, but whether it could mislead him. The bankruptcy notice served on the debtor is in the common form and tells the debtor that he must pay a certain sum to the creditors or their solicitors:

B “... or you must secure or compound for the said sum to their satisfaction, or to the satisfaction of their said agent, or to the satisfaction of this court, or you must satisfy this court that you have a counterclaim, set-off or cross-demand against them ...”

C The debtor has seven days in which to do that. How is he to do it? He is told “this court.” When he looks further at the notice, he may take his choice whether it is the Redhill County Court or the Windsor County Court. Suppose that he chooses the wrong one and goes to Redhill at the end of the seventh day with an affidavit to prove that he has a good set-off, there finds that he has gone to the wrong place and cannot get to Windsor that day, and, when he gets to Windsor, is told that he is too late because the period of seven days has expired, D it cannot be said that he is not embarrassed. Therefore, according to the authorities, I feel myself constrained to hold that this is not an error which we can correct.

E Re Evans, Davies v. Evans (8), a decision of a Divisional Court in Bankruptcy (LUXMOORE and FARWELL, JJ.), seems to me a similar case, as the mistake there was rather like the mistake here. The bankruptcy notice was intended to be issued out of the Glamorganshire County Court, but the original notice on the file of the county court was entitled “In the High Court of Justice,” though sealed with the county court seal. LUXMOORE, J., said [1931] B. & C.R. 58):

F “The notice directs the debtor to pay to the creditor or his agent or to secure or compound to the satisfaction of this court, i.e., the High Court. The original bankruptcy notice is a High Court form and not a county court form at all. The deponent to the affidavit of service deposes to the fact that he had served the debtor with a copy of the above-mentioned bankruptcy notice duly sealed with the seal of the court and the copy which is exhibited to the affidavit is not a true copy of the bankruptcy notice at all. This makes the bankruptcy notice quite hopelessly bad. The appeal will be allowed and the receiving order will be rescinded.”

G Even if I did not feel constrained by the earlier cases, I should feel constrained by Re Evans (8) to say that, in my judgment, for the reasons which I have stated, the receiving order in the case now before us was bad and must be rescinded.

H That makes it unnecessary. I think, for me to consider the other point which was taken by counsel for the debtor, namely, that there has been extortion, and I say no more about it. I do not wish to give a decision on that question because, in my judgment, the notice being bad, the petition founded on it fails in limine, and, therefore, the receiving order should be rescinded.

DANCKWERTS, J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs here and in the court below.

COCHRANE v. CHANCTONBURY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.JJ., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), November 14, 1950.]

Housing—Insanitary house—Notice to execute work—Appeal to county court—Owner's undertaking to do part of work—Power of court to quash notice as a whole—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 9 (1), s. 15 (2).

On May 4, 1950, a local authority served on the owner of a dwelling-house a notice under s. 9 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936, requiring her to execute certain works to render the house fit for habitation. The owner appealed to the county court against the notice under s. 15 (1) (a) of the Act on the ground that the work required to be executed was unnecessary and unreasonable having regard to the age and character of the premises. At the hearing she admitted that some of the work was necessary and reasonable, and undertook to execute it. The council did not ask that the order should be varied, and not quashed, having regard to the admissions of the owner, and in the result the appeal was allowed and the notice quashed in toto.

HELD: (i) as no submission had been made to the county court judge that as a matter of law the notice should not be quashed in respect of the work which the owner was prepared to do, that point could not be taken in the Court of Appeal.

(ii) even assuming that the point could have been taken, the judge was not bound to confirm the notice in respect of the work not disputed by the owner; he had power under s. 15 (2) of the Act to vary the notice or confirm it subject to variations, but, if he thought that the major requirements were excessive, he could quash the notice altogether.

(iii) if a local authority required work to be done which was altogether excessive the county court judge was not bound to amend the notice so as to specify the less work which would make it good. He might, if he thought fit, quash the notice, and leave the local authority to serve a fresh notice, specifying more limited work.

APPEAL by the Chanctonbury Rural District Council against an order made by His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., at Brighton County Court on June 29, 1950.

By a notice dated May 4, 1950, under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 9 (1), the council required the respondent house-owner, as a person having control of a house occupied, or suitable for occupation, by persons of the working classes within the meaning of the sub-section, to execute the works specified in the notice. The house-owner appealed to the county court under s. 15 (1) (a) of the Act, and the learned county court judge made an order quashing the notice. The council appealed.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and H. B. Grant for the local authority.

R. M. Bell for the owner.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., on an application under the Housing Act, 1936. Leaving out unnecessary words, s. 9 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936, reads thus:

"Where a local authority ... are satisfied that any house which is occupied ... by persons of the working classes is in any respect unfit for human habitation, they shall, unless they are satisfied that it is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit, serve upon the person having control of the house a notice requiring him, within such reasonable time, not being less than twenty-one days, as may be specified in the notice, to execute the works specified in the notice and stating that, in the opinion of the authority, those works will render the house fit for human habitation."

Sub-section 3 provides that the authority are to have regard to the estimated cost of the works necessary to render the house fit and the value which the house will have when the works are completed. Section 15 (1) gives a person aggrieved by a notice requiring the execution of works a right within twenty-one days of appeal to the county court within the jurisdiction of which the premises are situate. Sub-section 2 provides:

"On an appeal to a county court under this section—(a) the judge may make such order either confirming or quashing or varying the notice, demand or order as he thinks fit, and he may, if he thinks fit, accept from an appellant any such undertaking as might have been accepted by the local authority . . ."

[His LORDSHIP referred to the evidence; said that on May 4, 1950, the local authority served on the respondent house-owner a notice under s. 9 (1) requiring the owner to do certain works, and that the owner admitted the necessity of some of the items of work and undertook to execute them; and continued:] When the learned judge indicated in his judgment that he was going to quash the notice the local authority might have reminded him of the admission with regard to those items and submitted that the notice ought to have effect with regard to them. There might then have been further investigation or a formal undertaking might have been given, but, as no submission was made to the judge that as a matter of law the notice could not be quashed in respect of items of work which the owner said she was prepared to execute, I do not think that that point can be taken in this court. After hearing the evidence the judge found that the house was not unfit for human habitation, and he allowed the appeal and quashed the notice.

The first submission of counsel for the local authority was that the judge went wrong in law in that he looked at the house as a whole, asking the question: "Is this house as a whole unfit for human habitation," whereas the words of the Act are "is in any respect unfit for human habitation." Counsel submitted that where on the evidence certain new floor boards are required or some boards require renewing, that makes the house "in a respect" unfit for human habitation. Secondly, he submitted that, there thus being a defect which makes the house unfit in a respect for human habitation, as a matter of law the judge is wrong if he quashes instead of varying. I do not accept either of those propositions. I will take the second first. I think that in this class of case, where there is some admitted defect specified, the judge is entitled to say: "This notice is, in my view, on the wrong basis. It requires the execution of unnecessary work. I am not required under the Act to re-draft it for the local authority so as to specify what works, on the view I take, may be necessary. Let them, if so minded, serve a fresh notice." In the present case the judge was entitled to take that line, and, that being so, it is unnecessary for us to decide whether the defect which was disclosed in the evidence was one which, within s. 9 (1), renders the house "in any respect unfit for human habitation." For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

DENNING, L.J. : I do not wish it to be supposed that the courts are not anxious to see defective houses repaired, but it is very important to keep the right balance between the local authority and the owner. Since 1936 the county courts have been entrusted with the task of keeping the balance. They must see that defects are made good, but they must also protect the owner from undue burdens. There is one point which I must mention at once. In serving a notice the local authority are not bound to specify the particular respects in which they say the house is unfit for human habitation. They are only bound to specify the works which they require the owner to execute. That is what the local authority have done in this case, leaving the owner to find out for herself what the defects are. This method of giving notice is, no doubt, valid and, indeed, necessary, but it may have the consequence that, even if defects exist, the notice may be bad because the works required may be more than is reasonably necessary. Much less work may be sufficient to make good the defects without going to the expense which the notice involves. If a local authority requires work to be done which is altogether excessive, the judge is not bound to amend the notice, in their favour, so as to specify less work which would make it good. He may, if he thinks fit, quash it and leave the authority to serve a fresh notice specifying more limited work.

In this case the local authority required the owner to "take up and remove all decayed and dry rot affected floor timbers, excavate and remove earth to a suitable depth, and provide and lay four inches of cement concrete over the whole of the site, construct a new floor employing new timbers adequately supported, provide efficient means of sub-floor ventilation." The owner's surveyor took a different view about this room. He said: "Floor requires repair, but what is required is unreasonable. Some boards require renewing. New boards will make all as good as the existing good ones, which have probably been there for fifty years." There was, therefore, a difference as to what was reasonably necessary. The local authority required concrete over the whole of the site and a new floor, whereas the owner's surveyor said that new boards, where necessary, would suffice. That was a question of fact which the judge decided in favour of the owner. The requirements of the local authority in that respect, therefore, could not stand. Some of the other requirements were reasonable and were not disputed by the owner. She said she would do them, but that does not mean that in point of law the judge was bound to confirm the notice. He had, no doubt, power under the Act to vary the notice and to confirm it subject to variations, but he was not bound to do so. He was entitled to look at the notice as a whole, and if he thought the major requirements were altogether excessive, he might decide not to confirm it, even with variations, but to quash it altogether. That is what he chose to do, and I do not think we can say that in point of law he was wrong in so doing. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LLOYD-JACOB, J. : I agree. Of the three courses open to the judge, that is to say, either confirming, quashing, or varying this notice, the local authority invited the judge to confirm it. The owner invited the court to quash it. It was only in this court that it was really suggested that his proper duty was to vary it. Without expressing any concluded opinion, I should be disposed to regard the inclusion of the power to vary in s. 15 (1) as giving the county court judge power to order what was found to be necessary as a result of the hearing before him, but certainly not as imposing on him any obligation to discover what was necessary for himself.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. SIMPSON AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord Oaksey, Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord MacDermott), October 9, 10, 11, 12, 16, 17, 18, 19, November 23, 1950.]

Mistake—Money paid under mistake—Recovery—Claim in equity—Residue of testator's estate paid to charitable institutions by executors—Directions in will void for uncertainty—Rights of those entitled under intestacy to recover from institutions sums paid.

Limitation of Action—Recovery of sum paid under invalid residuary bequest—Action by next of kin—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 20.

By his will, dated Nov. 3, 1919, a testator, who died on Mar. 23, 1936, directed his executors to apply his residuary estate "for such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England" as they in their absolute discretion should select. On June 4, 1936, the deputy chairman of the Westminster Hospital applied to the executors for a contribution towards the fund for the erection of new buildings for the hospital. On Mar. 20, 1937, a cheque for £4,000 was sent to the treasurer of the hospital by the executors, and on Mar. 23, 1937, the cheque was paid into the "Westminster Hospital Re-building Fund Current Account" at a bank which showed at the close of business on that day a credit balance of £15,268. In 1939 certain of the testator's next of kin challenged the validity of the direction in the will, and on Oct. 18, 1939, the executors' solicitors wrote to the Westminster Hospital informing it of the challenge and asking that the sum paid should not be dealt with until further communication was received from the executors, but already by that date all moneys in the account in question had been applied in payments relating to the erection of new hospital buildings, and the account showed a debit balance of £9,508. In 1944 the House of Lords held that the residuary bequest was void for uncertainty. The next of kin, who had exhausted their remedy against the executors, did not assert any right to follow the £4,000 into assets held by the hospital, but they claimed that the hospital was under an equitable liability to refund to the estate the money wrongfully paid.

HELD: (i) even if in the Spiritual Courts (where the jurisdiction to administer the assets of a deceased person originally lay) the right of executors to require a legatee who was paid a legacy to give security was limited to the purpose of providing for the contingencies of further creditors appearing or there being a deficiency of assets to pay all legacies of equal rank pari passu, there was no reason why the remedy given by the Court of Chancery should be limited similarly.

(ii) there was no basis for the view that the equitable doctrine by which an unpaid legatee or creditor could recover from a person wrongfully paid by executors was only available to an unpaid legatee or creditor if the estate had been administered by the court, although it might be that where the executors had distributed the estate under an order of the court the unpaid person would not be required to bring a further action against them before proceeding against persons wrongfully paid, and there was no difference in the application of the doctrine whether the claimant beneficiary claimed as a residuary legatee or as next of kin, or whether or not the person paid was a "stranger" to the estate having no title to the money paid to him.

David v. Frowd (1833) (1 My. & K. 200), applied.

(iii) it was irrelevant to the application of the doctrine whether the executors paid wrongfully under a mistake of law or under a mistake of fact, and it was no answer to its application that the defendant had received the payment in good faith and had spent it without knowledge of any flaw in its title.

Dictum of ROMER, J., in Re Mason ([1928] 1 Ch. 391), criticised.

(iv) the action was in respect of a claim to personal estate within the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 20, and, therefore, the limitation period applicable was twelve years, and the claim was not barred.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL (sub nom. Re Diplock's Estate) ([1948] 2 All E.R. 318, 429), affirmed.

APPEAL by the Ministry of Health against an order of the Court of Appeal dated July 9, 1948.

The decision is reported sub nom. Re Diplock's Estate, Diplock and Others v. Wintle and Others at [1948] 2 All E.R. 318, and the supplementary judgment of the Court of Appeal in an associated action is reported sub nom. Re Diplock's

Estate, Simpson and Others v. Lilburn, at ibid., 429. The Court of Appeal thereby reversed an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated Mar. 11, 1947, and reported at [1947] 1 All E.R. 522. The decisions of the Court of Appeal and WYNN-PARRY, J., related to a number of associated actions brought by persons entitled to share in such part of an estate as to which the testator died intestate to recover certain sums of money paid to the defendants, charitable institutions, by the executors of the testator's will under a direction which was subsequently declared by the House of Lords to be void for uncertainty: Chichester Diocesan Fund v. Simpson ([1944] 2 All E.R. 60). WYNN-PARRY, J., held, inter alia, that the rule that money paid under a mistake of law was irrecoverable was of general application, and that the plaintiffs could not maintain a claim for the return of the money as money had and received. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeals on the general grounds: (i) that the plaintiffs had a right in personam in equity against the recipients which was not liable to be defeated by the fact that the payment to them had been made under a mistake of law by the executors, and (ii) that the plaintiffs had a right in rem to the money recognised by equity which would enable them to trace the money, providing only that it was possible to identify or disentangle it where it had been mixed with assets of the recipients.

Upjohn, K.C., Denys B. Buckley and Dunbar for the appellant, the Ministry of Health.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and J. L. Arnold for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Nov. 23. LORD SIMONDS read the following opinion. My Lords, on Mar. 23, 1936, Caleb Diplock died intestate as to his residuary estate, which amounted to over £250,000. He had, by his will dated Nov. 3, 1919, purported to dispose of it by directing his executors to apply it "for such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England" as his acting executors or executor might in their or his absolute discretion select. The invalidity of this disposition was finally established by this House in 1944. The proceedings in which this decision was given had been commenced on June 10, 1940, by the testator's executors by way of originating summons issued in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, but in the meantime, on Jan. 3, 1940, an action had been commenced in the same division by the first three respondents to the present appeal together with another person, claiming to be four of the next of kin of the testator, against the executors or their personal representatives, certain selected charitable institutions which had received donations from the executors, and the Attorney-General, claiming administration of the testator's estate. In this action—and it is for this purpose only that I think it necessary to mention it to your Lordships—an order was made on Apr. 5, 1944, by which the court approved a compromise of the claims of the plaintiffs against the executors and directed that such compromise should be binding on all persons beneficially entitled to the property of the testator. Under this order (inter alia) a sum of £15,000 was to be paid by the executors to the fourth respondent to this appeal, who had been appointed judicial trustee of the testator's estate. This order is relevant to the present appeal because its admitted effect is that by it the first three respondents and all other next of kin must be deemed to have exhausted whatever remedy they had against the executors in respect of the wrongful distribution of the estate. On July 28, 1945, the respondents issued the writ in the action in which this appeal arises. The original defendants were the president, vice-presidents, treasurer and governors of Westminster Hospital, a corporation incorporated by private Act of Parliament. This corporation was dissolved under the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and replaced by a new corporation created under that Act. It is, however, common ground between the parties that the appellant, the Ministry of Health, which was added as a defendant to the action by an order of the Court of Appeal, is, under s. 6 (1) of the same Act, liable to pay any sum due in respect of the respondents' claim. By their action the respondents claimed a declaration of the liability of the defendants to refund to the estate of the testator the sum of £4,000 which they had received out of that estate from the executors, with interest thereon, and an order for payment accordingly.

The relevant facts are not in dispute. On June 4, 1936, the deputy chairman of the hospital applied to the executors for a contribution towards the fund for the erection of new buildings for the hospital. On Mar. 20, 1937, a cheque for £4,000 was sent to one of the treasurers of the hospital by or on behalf of the executors under cover of a letter which, as is now admitted, did not affect the recipient with notice of the invalidity or possible invalidity of the residuary bequest in the will. On Mar. 23, 1937, the cheque was paid into the "Westminster Hospital Re-building Fund Current Account" at a branch of Barclays Bank, Ltd., which at the close of business on that day showed a credit balance of £15,268 1s. 10d. It was not until Oct. 18, 1939, that the defendants had notice of the claim of the next of kin and already by that date all moneys to the credit of the account in question had been applied in payments relating to the erection of the new hospital buildings, and the account showed a debit balance of £9,508 3s. 9d. In these circumstances it is not contended that the respondents can assert any right at law or in equity to follow or trace the sum of £4,000 into assets held by the appellant. The single question to be determined in this appeal is whether the original defendants were, and the appellant is, under a personal liability to refund to the estate of the testator the money wrongfully paid to them. This question has been answered in the negative by WYNN-PARRY, J., and in the affirmative by the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., and EVERSLED and WROTTESELEY, L.JJ.).

My Lords, I think that the reasoning and conclusion of the Court of Appeal are unimpeachable, and it is right to add that, if WYNN-PARRY, J., had had the advantage of the citation of authorities and of the argument based on them which the Court of Appeal and your Lordships have had, he might have come to a different conclusion. The problem for determination can be simply stated, and it is, perhaps, surprising that the sure answer to it is only to be found by an examination of authorities which go back nearly three hundred years. Acting under a mistake the personal representatives of a testator whose residuary disposition is invalid distribute his residuary estate on the footing that it is valid. Have the next of kin a direct claim in equity against the persons to whom it has been wrongfully distributed? I think that the authorities clearly establish that, subject to certain qualifications which I shall state, they have such a claim. I think that it is important in the discussion of this question to remember that the particular branch of the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery with which we are concerned relates to the administration of assets of a deceased person. While in the development of this jurisdiction certain principles were established which were common to it and to the comparable jurisdiction in the execution of trusts, I do not find in history or in logic any justification for an argument which denies the possibility of an equitable right in the administration of assets because, as it is alleged, no comparable right existed in the execution of trusts. I prefer to look solely at the authorities which are strictly germane to the present question. It is from them alone that the nature and extent of the equity are to be ascertained.

Before I turn back to the seventeenth century when the Court of Chancery was gradually wresting from the Spiritual Courts the jurisdiction in administering the assets of deceased persons and framing apt rules to that end, I will first refer to a statement made by LORD DAVEY early in this century, which, as I think, illuminates the position. In Harrison v. Kirk (1) LORD DAVEY says ([1904] A.C. 7):

"But the Court of Chancery, in order to do justice and to avoid the evil of allowing one man to retain what is really and legally applicable to the payment of another man, devised a remedy by which, where the estate had been distributed either out of court or in court without regard to the rights of a creditor, it has allowed the creditor to recover back what has been paid to the beneficiaries or the next of kin who derive title from the deceased testator or intestate."

- A The importance of this statement is manifold. It explains the basis of the jurisdiction, the evil to be avoided, and its remedy. Its clear implication is that no such remedy existed at common law. It does not suggest that it is relevant whether the wrong payment was made under error of law or of fact. It is immaterial whether those who have been wrongly paid are beneficiaries under the will or next of kin. It is sufficient that they derive title from the deceased. It is true
- B that LORD DAVEY expressly dealt with the case of a claimant creditor, not a beneficiary or next of kin. I shall show your Lordships that what he said of the one might equally well be said of the other. It would be strange if a court of equity, whose self-sought duty it was to see that the assets of a deceased person were duly administered and came into the right hands and not into the wrong hands, devised a remedy for the protection of the unpaid creditor, but left the
- C unpaid legatee or next of kin unprotected.

I think, my Lords, that it is not necessary for me to review all the authorities. This has been done with exhaustive accuracy by the Court of Appeal. I will refer only to certain cases which appear to me to be landmarks in the history of the equitable doctrine. In any such history the name of LORD NOTTINGHAM, L.C., must have first place. In Noel v. Robinson (2) the Lord Chancellor, after referring to the practice of the Spiritual Courts under which the executor was entitled to demand security of the legatee before paying his legacy in case the amount was required in discharge of debts, said (1 Vern. 93, 94):

- "... but in this court, though there be no provision made for refunding, yet the common justice of this court will compel a legatee to refund. It is certain that a creditor shall compel the legatee to refund, and so shall one legatee compel the other, where the assets become deficient ..."

I pause here for two purposes. First, I point out that already in 1682 a creditor and a legatee shared the remedy established by the common justice of the Court of Chancery. Secondly, it is a proper moment at which to deal with an argument which was put forward by learned counsel for the appellant. They urged that

F it was only in a limited class of cases that the Spiritual Court required a legatee, who was paid his legacy, to give security—first, to meet the contingency of further creditors appearing, and, secondly, to meet the case of a deficiency of assets to pay all legacies of equal rank pari passu—and that the remedy which the Court of Chancery gave should be similarly circumscribed. The purpose and effect of the argument, if accepted, would be to deny any remedy against persons

G wrongly paid to next of kin rightfully entitled. I cannot accept this argument. In the first place, I am by no means satisfied that the practice of the Spiritual Court was so limited. The contention was largely based on the fact that the only two precedents of bonds which had been discovered did not cover any other than the contingencies already mentioned. At this distance of time I do not think that this can be regarded as conclusive evidence of the practice. But, in

H the second place, I see no justification for regarding the equitable doctrine of the Court of Chancery as limited to the previous practice, if it was the practice, of the Spiritual Court. That it was not so regarded will appear from a later case to which I will shortly refer.

I pass over numerous cases in which the equitable remedy was refined and elaborated. Their effect is stated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal and summarised in the passage from ROPER ON LEGACIES, 4th ed., which is cited in that judgment ([1948] 2 All E.R. 327), but I should in passing mention Orr v.

Kaines (3) in which it was clearly established that the right of an underpaid legatee to claim directly against the overpaid legatee is subject to this qualification, that he must first exhaust his remedy against the executor who has made the wrongful payment. It was for this reason that I mentioned at an earlier stage of this opinion that the next of kin must be deemed to have recovered from the executors all that they could recover. They had then no other way to recover the balance that was due to them than by proceeding directly against the appellant and other institutions among which the executors had distributed the estate. It must at this point be said that a distinction on which WYNN-PARRY, J., relied has no validity. Not having had his attention called to the earlier authorities, the learned judge was disposed to think that the equitable remedy, even where it existed, was only available to an unpaid creditor or legatee if the estate had been administered by the court. There is no ground for this broad distinction, though it may well be that a distinction exists, viz., that, where the executor has distributed the estate under an order of the court the unpaid creditor would not be required to bring a further action against him before proceeding against persons wrongfully paid.

I go forward nearly a century, during which the equitable doctrine had been recognised by successive Lord Chancellors and Masters of the Rolls, and come to David v. Frowd (4), a case on which the respondents rely as most nearly resembling the present case. The resemblance lies in the fact that, there too, the plaintiff was next of kin of an intestate who claimed against the defendants that the estate of the intestate should have been paid to her, but had been wrongfully paid to them. The distinction, if it is a material one, is that there the payment had been due to a mistaken view (whether of fact or law) that the defendants were the true next of kin, while here it was due to a mistaken view as to the validity of the residuary bequest. My Lords, I think that, subject always to one point to which I shall presently refer, David v. Frowd (4) is an authority strongly in favour of the respondents. It is fatal to the appellant's argument, which I have already mentioned, that the equitable remedy was confined to the cases of unpaid creditor or legatee, and is consistent only with the view that the remedy was one (to adapt LORD DAVEY's words) devised by the Court of Chancery in the administration of assets of a deceased person to avoid the evil of allowing one man to retain money legally payable to another and was applicable wherever it could appropriately be applied. Two other cases on which the respondents relied I will mention before I examine those which the appellant cited as supporting his contention—the first Peterson v. Peterson (5) in which LORD ROMILLY, M.R., once more asserted the equity, making no distinction between claimant residuary legatees and next of kin, and, the second, Re Rivers (6), where EVE, J., recognised and applied it.

Here then, my Lords, is a long line of authority extending over more than 250 years, resting on decisions of judges of the highest authority and broken by no dissentient voice. Why should it not cover the present case? Three arguments put forward by the appellant I have already mentioned and disposed of, the first founded on a supposed relation between the assumed practice of the Spiritual Court and the scope of the remedy provided by the Court of Chancery, the second based on a distinction between wrongful payments made when there has and when there has not been administration by the court, and the third (which is bound up with the first) that there is a distinction between claimant residuary legatees and next of kin. It remains to deal with two other arguments. It was said that the equity was not applicable against a "stranger," and that the appellant (or the hospital through whom it claimed), having been paid money to which it was not lawfully entitled, since the disposition under which it took was invalid, was to be regarded as a stranger. This argument is wholly without substance. The hospital received £4,000 for no other reason than that the executors thought that it was a proper object for the testator's bounty. It was treated as a beneficiary under the testator's will, and, to use LORD DAVEY's words, derived title under it. It does not appear to me that a person so receiving money from the estate of a testator is in a different position from any other person to whom money is paid on the footing that under the testator's will money can be lawfully paid to him though, in fact, the payment is wrongful.

- I come, finally, to the argument on which counsel for the appellant laid the greatest stress, relying not only on the judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., but on the other cases which have yet to be examined. It was that the equitable remedy was subject at least to this qualification—that it was not applicable where the wrongful payment was made in error of law. It was said that in every case where it had been applied the wrongful payment had been made under a mistake of fact, and that, wherever the principle had been stated without any such qualification, it must be read, nevertheless, as subject to it. I think, my Lords, that this argument, which found favour with the learned judge, is misconceived. In the first place, though in almost all the reported cases the probability is that the wrongful payment was made under a mistake of fact, that is not true of all of them, and in many of them, while the probability is in one direction, there can be no certainty without further information which is not now available. This leads directly to the second reason. In not one of the many cases where the equity was applied was any suggestion made in argument or judgment that the issue depended on the nature of the mistake under which the wrongful payment had been made. It is not credible that, if the distinction between mistake of fact and law was relevant, it would never have been mentioned, particularly at a time when in the courts of common law it was being established. And here it may be observed that the equitable doctrine was well settled before that event took place, for such cases as Farmer v. Arundel (7), Bize v. Dickason (8), Brisbane v. Dacres (9), Bilbie v. Lumley (10), show that up to the end of the eighteenth century there were in high places doubts as to the validity of the distinction in the common law. In the third place, the most satisfactory reason for the distinction rests in the maxim, itself probably taken from the criminal law, ignorantia juris neminem excusat: see Baylis v. London (Bp.) (11). The man who makes a wrong payment because he has mistaken the law may not plead his own ignorance of the law and so cannot recover what he has wrongfully paid. It is difficult to see what relevance this distinction can have where a legatee does not plead his own mistake or his own ignorance, but, having exhausted his remedy against the executor who has made the wrongful payment, seeks to recover money from him who has been wrongfully paid. To such a suit the executor was not a necessary party and there was no means by which the plaintiff could find out whether his mistake was of law or of fact or even whether his wrongful act was mistaken or deliberate. He could guess and ask the court to guess, but he could prove nothing. I reject, therefore, the suggestion that the equitable remedy in such circumstances was thus restricted, and repeat that it would be a strange thing if the Court of Chancery, having taken on itself to see that the assets of a deceased person were duly administered, was deterred from doing justice to a creditor, legatee, or next of kin because the executor had done him wrong under a mistake of law. If, in truth, this were so, I think that the Father of Equity would not recognise his child.

- I turn now to the cases on which the appellant relies. The first of these is Rogers v. Ingham (12), and, as it is placed in the forefront of the appellant's argument (as it was in the judgment of the learned judge), it is worth examining in some detail. The headnote reads as follows (3 Ch.D. 351):

“The court will not in all cases relieve against a payment of money under mistake of law. An executor, acting on the advice of counsel on the construction of a will, proposed to divide in certain proportions a fund between two legatees. One of the legatees being dissatisfied took the opinion of counsel, which agreed with the former opinion. The executor then divided and paid over the fund in accordance with the opinions. Two years afterwards the dissatisfied legatee filed a bill against the executor and the other legatee, alleging that the will had been wrongly construed, and claiming repayment from the other legatee: Held (affirming the decision of HALL, V.-C.), that the suit could not be maintained."

As appears from the headnote, the case came first before HALL, V.-C., and, though there is no note of the argument before him, it is clear from his judgment how he regarded the issue. He said (ibid., 353):

"It seems to me that the fund was divided as a matter of arrangement between the parties, and that having taken place more than two years before the bill was filed, I ought not to give the assistance of this court for the purpose of recalling that fund from the defendant, who received it upon the faith and footing of what took place on that occasion."

From his judgment the plaintiff appealed, and again it is clear how the issue was regarded both by counsel and by the court.

"Payment by my trustee is payment by me, and I ought to recover the money. A court of equity can relieve against the consequences of a mistake of law; moreover this is hardly a pure question of law."

Thus argued counsel for the appellant (ibid., 354). He made no reference to the long line of authority which confirmed the equitable right that arises in an administration of assets, perhaps because the act of wrongful distribution was done by Ingham, the surviving executor and trustee, not in his capacity of executor (in this respect the headnote is misleading), but in his capacity of trustee distributing a trust fund. He may have thought, and he may have rightly thought (I do not think it necessary to decide it), that the cases had no relevance to an alleged breach of trust. Nor, on the other hand, did counsel for the respondent legatee point out that according to the established rule the plaintiff could not recover from him until she had exhausted her remedy against Ingham or his estate. Ingham had, in fact, died and his executor was a party to the suit, but he seems to have taken no part in the proceedings, and there was no evidence that Ingham's estate was insolvent. It was in these circumstances that JAMES, L.J., almost in the opening words of his judgment said (ibid., 355):

"When a trustee, by the direction or with the authority of his cestui que trust, pays money to a third person, no matter under what claim of right or under what circumstances, it is exactly the same as if the cestui que trust had received the money from the trustee, and had herself paid it to that person. It is simply a question of money paid by the lady, or the lady's direction, out of money of hers which the trustee had in hand to a person who said that he had a claim to the money."

Already it is sufficiently clear what are the facts to which the relevant law must be applied, but I will cite a few lines more which are a clue to the whole judgment. The lord justice goes on (ibid.):

"That being so, it is reduced, as it appears to me, to a mere action for money had and received, and it is the same as if A through a third person had paid money to B, thinking that B was entitled to it, B thinking also that he was entitled to it; there having been, as it is now said, a mistake of law which was common to both parties."

It is in this context that he later uses the words so much relied on by the appellant (ibid.):

"I have no doubt that there are some cases which have been relied on, in which this court has not adhered strictly to the rule that a mistake in law is not always incapable of being remedied in this court; but relief has never been given in the case of a simple money demand by one person against another, there being between those two persons no fiduciary relation whatever, and no equity to supervene by reason of the conduct of either of the parties."

It is, I think, clear that the learned lord justice, whose every word on a question of equitable principle is weighty, was dealing solely with a case where (in his own language) a trustee by the direction or with the authority of his cestui que

A trust pays money to a third person, and was not dealing with a case where, without his acquiescence or even his knowledge, an executor wrongs a creditor or beneficiary by paying to another money which should be paid to him.

The next case to be considered is Re Robinson (13). Two preliminary observations may be made—first, that the case was not concerned with a wrongful distribution of assets in the administration of an estate, and, secondly, that the

B sole question was what, if any, statute of limitations was applicable to the claim. The claim was by a beneficiary under a trust, who alleged that he had been underpaid, directly against a beneficiary under the same trust who had been overpaid. The learned judge had first to determine its nature. It was, he said, a "mere money demand by the plaintiff against the defendant." He then states the rival contentions, the defendant saying that it was in reality a common

C law action for money had and received, and, therefore, barred by the lapse of six years under the statute of James I (21 Jac. 1, c. 16), the plaintiff, on the other hand, saying that, where a trust fund had by mistake been paid by the trustee to the wrong beneficiary, there was not in the old Court of Chancery any bar by lapse of time to the recovery of lost money. He says that the defendant's contention would prima facie appear to be right, analysing the position and

D saying that the party whose money had been wrongly paid away could, at all events, have maintained a suit in equity for it—a statement which points the contrast between such a suit and one by a legatee against a legatee in which the joinder of the executor as plaintiff was fatal: see Hodges v. Waddington (14), and he concludes ([1911] 1 Ch. 508):

E "But whether the action is treated as a strict claim in law for money had and received, or whether it is brought as a claim in equity through the medium of a trustee—in whichever way it is regarded—at first sight, inasmuch as the court has always acted by analogy to the statute, one can see no reason why the period fixed by the statute should not bar the right of the plaintiff to recover."

F The learned judge then deals with certain cases on which the plaintiff had relied and sums up by a classification of the cases in which mistakes have been made by trustees in payment of trust funds. I doubt with respect whether the classification is exhaustive, but in any case it is made for no other purpose than to show in what cases a court of equity regarded a claim by a cestui que trust as not barred by any lapse of time. The learned judge concludes thus (ibid., 513):

G "The present case resolves itself into this—that although, owing to the fact that the plaintiff is not the person who paid the money, the action is one which could not have been maintained at common law, it is in substance a mere money demand to which a court of equity, acting by analogy to the statute, would apply the same period of limitation."

H I have been led to examine this case at some length because of the emphasis laid on it by the appellant. Having done so, I find in it no support for the contention that the equity which is the foundation of the present claim is qualified by the condition that the wrongful payment must not have been made under a mistake of law. The learned judge was not considering that question. With great respect I cannot (notwithstanding the subsequent approval of ROMER, J., in the case to which I next refer) accept his reading of the decree made by LORD ROMILLY, M.R., in Harris v. Harris (No. 2) (15), for it is, I think, clear that the defendant in that suit was, in effect, held liable to repay moneys which he had been wrongly paid, though in form the liability was declared to be to replace certain annuities of which he had received the proceeds of sale. Nor, with respect, can I assent to the view first expressed by the learned judge that the action is prima facie "in reality a common law action for money had and received," though I would be inclined to accept the modified statement already cited with which he concludes his judgment. I see no reason to doubt that to a claim, whether made by legatee against legatee, or by cestui que trust against cestui que trust, in respect of a payment made under a mistake of fact or of law, a court of equity could properly, before the Limitation Act, 1939, came into force, apply by analogy the statute of James I. Nor do I understand that counsel for the respondents on this appeal dissents from that proposition.

I am brought now to Re Mason (16). The judgment of ROMER, J., in that case, so far as it was in any way relevant to the matter under appeal, was that a petition of right presented by the next of kin of a lunatic who had died in 1798 was barred by the statute of James I. I do not doubt that the decision was correct for the same reasons that I have given in regard to the decision in Re Robinson (13), but the appellant relies on certain statements by the learned judge which, in his contention, militate against the view that the equitable doctrine relied on by the respondents was applicable where the wrongful payment was made under a mistake of law. The learned judge makes the assumption that the whole of the estate of the lunatic had come into the hands of King George III and says ([1928] 1 Ch. 391):

"On that assumption the claim of the suppliants is one to recover from the Crown moneys that in fact belonged to Maria L'Epine's next of kin, but was wrongfully paid over by her administrators to King George III. It is, in other words, a claim by a cestui que trust to recover from a third party money which his trustee has by mistake paid to that third party. Such a claim is one for money had and received."

I pause to observe that the learned judge, who had had cited to him none of the long line of cases involving claims for refund in the administration of assets, treated the claim as if it were a claim by one cestui que trust against another and then referred to such a claim as one for money had and received, and it was on that footing that, after referring to Re Robinson (13), he said that, if the claim of the trustee would be barred in an action at law by any statute of limitations, the claim of the cestui que trust, so far as it was for money had and received, would be equally barred. My Lords, I must with the greatest deference to the learned judge observe that an action by a legatee or next of kin to recover money paid to the wrong person in the administration of assets is not a claim by one cestui que trust against another, and that, whatever may be said of the latter, it cannot with any formal accuracy be said that the former is an action for money had and received. Such an action is an action at common law deriving from indebitatus assumpsit. I will not embark on the rather arid dispute whether its gist was an implied promise, but it has, I think, no relation to the equity by which for three hundred years such a claim as the respondents now make has been supported. It is true that in Moses v. Macferlan (17) LORD MANSFIELD said (2 Burr. 1012):

"In one word, the gist of this kind of action is, that the defendant . . . is obliged by the ties of natural justice and equity to refund the money," but this broad statement contained, perhaps, less the basis on which the action at common law was founded than an aspiration as to the area over which it might one day extend. There remained a field over which "this essentially common law action" (as LORD SUMNER in Sinclair v. Brougham (18) called it) did not extend. The plaintiff in David v. Frowd (4), for instance, could not, I think, have maintained an action for money had and received in a court of common law. If this is so, the fact that, as the common law action developed, it was established that a mistake of law would not support a claim for repayment, appears to me to afford no justification for saying that this equitable right was similarly limited. Therefore, while, as I have said, I do not question the decision, which was, indeed, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, I do not think that it helps the appellant's case. In the Court of Appeal LAWRENCE, L.J., [in Re Mason] agreed that the proceedings were "in effect" proceedings for money had and received. My respectful comment would be that this is not an inaccurate statement since the effect of the action, if it succeeds, would be the same.

The appellant next relied on some observations made by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Blake (19), a case not unlike Re Mason (16) in that here, too, it was pleaded by the Crown that a claim made by petition of right was barred by the statute of James I. In the course of his judgment, the learned judge said ([1932] 1 Ch. 60):

"An action in the Chancery Division brought by the next of kin against a person to whom the administrator had wrongly paid part of the personal estate of the intestate under a mistake of fact (not joining the administrator and seeking administration) would be in the nature of a common law action for money had and received, and the court acting on the analogy of the statute of James I (21 Jac. 1, c. 16) would hold the claim to be barred after the lapse of six years from the date of payment . . ."

It would, I think, be hypercritical to quarrel with this statement in which the learned judge so guardedly refers to such an action as being "in the nature of a common law action." In my judgment, it gives no support to the appellant's contention. Two other cases I will do no more than mention—Hilliard v. Fulford (20), and Re Hatch (21)—for I am fully satisfied with the observations of the Court of Appeal on them.

Finally, my Lords, I must say some words on an argument of a more general character put forward on behalf of the appellant. The Court of Chancery, it was said, acted on the conscience, and, unless the defendant had behaved in an unconscientious manner, would make no decree against him. The appellant, or those through whom he claimed, having received a legacy in good faith and having spent it without knowledge of any flaw in their title, ought not in conscience to be ordered to refund. My Lords, I find little help in such generalities. On the propriety of a legatee refusing to repay to the true owner the money that he has wrongly received I do not think it necessary to express any judgment. It is a matter on which opinions may well differ. The broad fact remains that the Court of Chancery, in order to mitigate the rigour of the common law or to supply its deficiencies, established the rule of equity which I have described, and this rule did not excuse the wrongly paid legatee from repayment because he had spent what he had been wrongly paid. No doubt, the plaintiff might by his conduct, and, particularly, by laches, have raised some equity against himself, but, if he had not done so, he was entitled to be repaid. In the present case the respondents have done nothing to bar them in equity from asserting their rights. They can only be defeated if they are barred at law by some statute of limitation. It is common ground between the parties that the only statute now applicable is the Limitation Act, 1939, which came into operation on July 1, 1940, and the question is: Which of the sections of this Act is applicable to the present case? I hope I shall not be thought wanting in respect to the elaborate argument of counsel for the appellant if I deal with this question very shortly. I do so because on the main point, viz., the applicability of s. 20, which the respondents assert and the appellant denies, I am in complete agreement with the reasoning and conclusion of the Court of Appeal and cannot usefully add anything of my own. The present action is precisely within the language of the section.

It is in respect of a claim to the personal estate of Caleb Diplock, and there is nothing in the ancestry of the section which justifies, much less requires, a narrower meaning being given to its words than they ordinarily bear. It is suggested that there is something awkward or inapposite in the terminus a quo, inasmuch as the relevant period is to run from the date when the right to receive the share accrued. I think that this criticism is ill-founded. There is nothing inappropriate in a legatee or next of kin who has brought no action for twelve years after the executor's year has expired being barred from such action whether against the executor himself or against the person to whom the executor has made wrongful payment. At the least, there is nothing so inappropriate in such a result as to deprive the substantive words of the section of their plain meaning. Section 20 applying to this action, and it being conceded that the relevant period had not expired before it was brought, the defence under the statute fails. I think it, therefore, unnecessary to say anything about s. 26 by way of approval or disapproval of what fell from the Court of Appeal. It is a section which presents many problems.

One thing only remains to be said. The action was brought by three only of the next of kin who are said to be a numerous body and their claim was not that their share of the £4,000 wrongfully paid away should be paid to them, but that the whole of that sum should be paid to their co-plaintiff the judicial trustee to be dealt with by him in due course of administration of the estate. No objection was taken by the appellant to this course at any stage of the action, and his counsel has expressly disclaimed any wish to do so now. Accordingly, this appeal must be dismissed. But he has at the same time properly said that his present disclaimer should not prejudice any other of the numerous charitable institutions against whom similar actions are pending. I agree, and express no opinion whatever whether any such objection could be sustained. I move, my Lords, that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 23, 1950.]

Charity—Benefit to community—Aged persons—Gift to persons in certain parish over sixty-five years of age—Charitable Uses Act, 1601 (43 Eliz., c. 4), preamble.

The words "aged, impotent and poor people" in the preamble to the Charitable Uses Act, 1601, are to be read disjunctively so that, for example, aged people need not also be poor to be objects of charity.

By his will, dated Sept. 11, 1947, a testator, who died on May 8, 1948, after bequeathing certain legacies, gave his residuary estate to "the Little Sisters of the Poor of Longton and Stoke-on-Trent and the old people over sixty-five years of Hazel Slade near Hednesford to be given as my trustees think best."

HELD: on the true construction of the will the Little Sisters of the Poor were entitled absolutely to one moiety of the residuary estate, and the remaining moiety was the subject of a good charitable bequest to a class of persons in the parish specified who were qualified by their age to participate, and a scheme would be directed in respect thereof.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, the construction of the residuary gift contained in the will of John Robinson, deceased. The facts and relevant part of the will are stated in the judgment of VAISEY, J.

A. A. B. Fuller for the plaintiffs, two of the executors of the will.

- C H. G. Watson for the first to eighth defendants, persons interested on the deceased's intestacy.

A. F. M. Berkeley, R. L. Stone and P. W. E. Taylor for the ninth, tenth and eleventh defendants respectively, each of whom claimed to be interested under the trusts of the will.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

- D VAISEY, J.: This summons raises a very short question of construction, although it is not, perhaps, an easy one. The testator, whose religious associations were, I think, properly described as inter-denominational, because he gave gifts to the Primitive Methodist Chapel, the Wesleyan Chapel and, I think, the Church of England, gave the remainder of his estate in these words:

- E "I give the remainder of my estate to the Little Sisters of the Poor of Longton and Stoke-on-Trent and the old people over sixty-five years of Hazel Slade near Hednesford to be given as my trustees think best."

Although there are no words of severance, I think that this gift ought to be construed as a gift in equal shares between the two objects, each of which, in my judgment, is plainly charitable. I think one half of the ultimate residue

- F goes to that branch of the institution known as the Little Sisters of the Poor which is represented here by the mother superior of the institution and identified by her evidence as St. Augustine's, Hanley, near Stoke-on-Trent.

That disposes of half of the estate because, in my judgment, the concluding words, "to be given as my trustees think best," although grammatically they might be held to give some discretion to the trustees over and in respect of

- G the whole of the residue, refer only to the second half of the estate which the testator gives to the "old people over sixty-five years" of Hazel Slade, near Hednesford. I think they give the trustees a discretion as to the manner in which these old people are to be benefited. A pleasant little organisation has been carried on for many years called the Hazel Slade Old Folks Entertainment and Tea Fund, and there is a defendant before me representing it. The rule,

- H as stated in a minute book, is that all old people who have resided for at least three months in the village are entitled to go to the Christmas party which the organisation arranges and to have entertainment. Various moneys are collected in the village and those who are qualified by their age share any surplus money there may be. This yearly entertainment, which provides social entertainment for the recipients and promotes good feeling among them, leads to the formation and cementing of friendships. It is suggested that when the testator said "the old people over sixty-five years," he was referring to that organisation and that the gift was to the tea and entertainment fund. I do not think so. I think that, according to the proper construction of the will, the gift is to the old people direct as a class, not as individuals, but as a group of people who are, within the Charitable Uses Act, 1601, qualified, not by poverty, sickness, or impotence, but by age. It has been held by DANCKWERTS, J., recently that the Charitable Uses Act, 1601, brought within the ambit of "charity" those who satisfy any one of the three qualifications of age, poverty, impotence or sickness. He took that view in Re Glyn's Will Trusts (1)* and I followed that decision recently in Re Bradbury (2)*. In Re Bradbury (2) the testatrix directed that her residuary fund should be applied for the maintenance of an aged person or persons in a nursing home approved by her trustees. Although I conceive the aged person in a nursing home may not be in the least in need of any sort of pecuniary assistance, I nevertheless held, following the decision in Re Glyn's Will Trusts (1), that it was a good charitable gift.

In the present case I think that "the old people over sixty-five years" in a particular parish are a class of persons just as much objects of charity, having regard to the preamble of the statute, as the poor of the parish or the sick of the parish. They are, I think, proper objects of the charitable purposes of the testator in regard to the second half of his estate. It will be observed that the testator appears to place great confidence in the discretion of his trustees, and, while I think it would be proper in this case for a scheme to be brought into chambers and settled for the administration of the second half of the charitable gift, I see no reason why there should be any objection to leaving a proper discretion in the hands of the trustees. I hold that this is a good charitable gift, but require it to be defined by the appropriate method of a scheme which will be sanctioned by the court.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties down to and including the order to be taxed as between solicitor and client and to be paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

* In Re Glyn's Will Trusts, heard by DANCKWERTS, J., on July 7, 1950, the testatrix bequeathed her residuary estate, subject to a life interest, to trustees on trust to build and endow free cottages for old women of the working classes of the age of sixty or upwards. DANCKWERTS, J., held that the trusts were valid charitable trusts, saying that the words "aged, impotent and poor" in the preamble to the Charitable Uses Act, 1601, were to be read disjunctively, so that aged people need not also be poor to come within the preamble. A trust for the relief of aged persons was, therefore, charitable.

In Re Bradbury, decd., heard by VAISEY, J., on Nov. 17, 1950, the testatrix directed: "My trustees shall invest the residue of my estate on deposit in their names as trustees of the Frances Bradbury Bequest for the Aged and shall pay from this bequest fund sum or sums for the maintenance of an aged person or persons in a nursing home approved by my trustees until the said fund shall be exhausted." The "Frances Bradbury Bequest for the Aged" was not an existing organisation, but one which the testatrix wished to found posthumously. The question arose whether the terms of the residuary bequest constituted a good charitable gift.

HILL-VENNING v. BESZANT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.J.J.), October 25, 26, 27, 1950.]

Negligence—Highway—Unlighted motor-cycle stationary at night.

A The defendant, a motor-cyclist, stopped at night on a highway because the lighting system of his motor-cycle had failed. He alighted, leaving the motor-cycle, which was about three feet in breadth at its broadest point, on the highway. There was a grass verge, level with the surface of the highway, to which the defendant could have wheeled his motor-cycle without difficulty. He did not do so, however, as he assumed that all that was needed was to change the bulb in the headlight. He then discovered that the fault was in the electric wiring, and when he was about to do the necessary repairs he noticed the light
B of an approaching vehicle, which was the plaintiff's motor-cycle. The plaintiff, who had his headlight dipped, failed to observe the defendant's motor-cycle in time to avoid it, and he came into collision with it. It was not disputed that the plaintiff had been negligent. On the question whether the defendant had also been negligent in not removing his motor-cycle from the highway on to the grass verge,

C HELD (SOMERVELL, L.J., dissenting): the defendant, by failing to remove his motor-cycle off the highway, had not taken all reasonable precautions to prevent danger to other traffic. He was, therefore, negligent, and the blame for the accident must be apportioned as to two-thirds to the plaintiff and one-third to the defendant.

(1) Henley v. Cameron, [1949] L.J.R. 989; 2nd Digest Supp.

E APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., made on May 24, 1950, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for personal injuries on the ground of the defendant's negligence.

On June 24, 1948, after lighting-up time, the plaintiff was riding his motor-cycle on a road leading from Guildford to Farnham when he came into collision with the defendant's motor-cycle which was stationary at the side of the road owing to a failure of the lighting system. The road at this point was wide and decided by BENNETT, J., where the gift was for the payment of the expenses and maintenance of patients from the two named parishes to and at two named hospitals or either of them. It was held that the gift was a trust for the relief of impotent and poor people within the purposes set out in the preamble to the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, and was a valid charitable bequest. The other case, Re Glyn's Will Trusts (2), was recently before DANCKWERTS, J. There there was a trust for founding and endowing free cottages for old women of the working classes of the age of sixty years or upwards. That was held to be a good charitable bequest, having regard to the fact that the preamble to the statute of Elizabeth included the relief of aged, impotent and poor people. He pointed out that these words must be read disjunctively, because otherwise those who were poor could not be the objects of charity unless they were also aged and impotent. Therefore, DANCKWERTS, J., thought that, so long as a person was either aged, or impotent, or poor, or any two of those designations, he was a proper G object of charity. I think that the present case is very near the line, and that where a case is near the line there must be a bias in favour of doing what the testatrix obviously wanted to be done. On the whole I think, relying on the observations of the judges in the two cases to which I have referred, I must hold that this gift is validly given for a charitable purpose.

straight and bordered by a grass verge level with its surface, and the defendant would have had no difficulty in moving his motor-cycle on the verge. He did not do so, thinking that all that was required was to change the bulb in his headlight. He then discovered that the tail light was also out and that there was a fault in the electric wiring. Still being of the opinion that the fault could be quickly repaired, he did not move his motor-cycle, but left it standing with its off-side some three feet from the verge. While repairing the wiring, he observed the light of the plaintiff's motor-cycle approaching from behind. The plaintiff had his headlight dipped and failed to see the defendant's motor-cycle in time to avoid it. PARKER, J., held that the defendant had not been guilty of negligence, or not of sufficient negligence for the blame to be apportioned otherwise than 100 per cent. to the plaintiff.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and G. G. Baker for the plaintiff.

E. Richardson for the defendant.

COHEN, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question is whether the defendant was negligent in not removing his motor-cycle from the highway. I agree with the learned judge that negligence is a failure to take due care in all the circumstances of the case, and that we have to look at all the circumstances in reaching a conclusion. On the facts of this case I am unable to acquit the defendant from all negligence. He was, no doubt, justified in stopping where he did, and, though I feel some doubt about it, I should be prepared to accept that it may not have been unreasonable on his part to try to fit the bulb before he moved the motor-cycle off the road on to the grass verge, but when he discovered that it was not merely the failure of the headlight, but observed that the tail-light was also out and that it was a question of finding where the breakdown in the electrical wiring was, the position was entirely different.

In those circumstances, there being no difficulty in moving the motor-cycle off the road, that was a precaution which it was plainly the defendant's duty to take, even if he had not seen the light of the plaintiff's motor-cycle. When he saw the light, however, and knew that there was some vehicle behind him, it seems to me to reinforce the view that he should have taken the easy precaution of moving the motor-cycle off the road. I do not think the reasons that he gave for not doing so can be accepted as satisfactory. He says that he thought he could complete the work before the plaintiff's motor-cycle came along. Having regard to the fact that he knew by this time that both lights were out and that there was a failure of the electrical system, I do not think it was a conclusion to which he was justified in coming or that he took the action appropriate to the circumstances. We have to be very careful before we take the view that there is no negligence in leaving a stationary obstacle on the road after lighting-up time when it is not plainly visible to approaching vehicles without the aid of full headlights and when it could easily be moved off the road. In those circumstances, some responsibility must rest on the defendant for leaving this obstacle on the side of the road. The learned judge based his conclusions in part on the difference between a motor lorry and a motor-cycle. From some points of view it is much more serious to leave unlighted a large lorry than a motor-cycle, because of the consequences which will ensue in the event of an accident, but what has been said about a lorry applies with some force also to the case of a motor-cycle. It may be when we come to the question of degree of responsibility that the difference between the two vehicles will come into play, but that is a different question. For these reasons, therefore, in my view, the defendant cannot be acquitted of responsibility.

Anyone who finds himself after lighting-up time with an unlighted vehicle on the road is negligent if he does not take any reasonable precaution to avoid an accident. What it is reasonable to do must depend on the circumstances of each case. If this road had been bounded by a wall or a high hedge, it may well be that the defendant would not have been negligent, but that was not the case.

Once one recognises that there was negligence, the defendant must have a share of the responsibility sufficiently large to prevent him taking the advantage of the maxim de minimis non curat lex. The amount of the contribution is always a difficult matter, but I have come to the conclusion that the proper answer to the question as to the share of responsibility is that the plaintiff was responsible to the extent of two-thirds and the defendant to the extent of one-third.

- A SOMERVELL, L.J.: On the question of liability, I am in disagreement with my learned brethren. This was a straight road. It was open in the sense that it had a verge and was not one in which foliage or fencing came to the edge of the road where the bicycle was which in certain circumstances might have made it more difficult for the plaintiff to see an unlighted obstacle.
- B There was no other traffic on the road. The defendant reasonably thought he could do this repair in a few minutes. In my view, he was entitled to succeed on the basis that he was plainly visible for a considerable distance to any oncoming motor traffic with ordinary headlights. Reliance is placed on the fact that he saw some way off the lights of the plaintiff's motor-cycle. What he saw indicated to him that it was a machine with an ordinary headlight,
- C and I should have thought he was entitled to assume he would be plainly visible for a period long enough for the plaintiff to pass on some part of the road other than that on which he was, and so avoid a collision. I would have come to the conclusion that there was no negligence in the defendant failing to take the motor-cycle on the verge at that stage.

- D DENNING, L.J.: I start with the proposition, which is clear beyond controversy, that this unlighted motor-cycle was a danger in the road. Any unlighted obstacle on a fast motor road is a danger to traffic. That is a proposition, not of law, but of common sense. SINGLETON, L.J., expressed the same view in Henley v. Cameron (1) when he said ([1949] L.J.R. 997):

" . . . unlighted vehicles or obstacles on a highway at night-time are a danger . . . "

- E The presence of an unlighted vehicle in a road is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the driver, and it is for him to explain how it came to be unlighted and why he could not move it out of the way or give warning to oncoming traffic. In the present case I do not think that the defendant gave a sufficient explanation. I could understand that, if there was a ditch along-
- F side so that he could not move the motor-cycle off the road, that might have been some explanation. Here, however, the edge of the main road was level with the grass verge which ran alongside it, and the motor-cycle could easily have been run on the verge so as not to be a danger. He had been stopped there some five minutes when the oncoming motor-cycle ran into his unlighted machine, and, on his own evidence, the oncoming machine was about three
- G feet out into the road. So the off-side of his machine must have been three feet out also. That was an important cause of the accident, and the defendant cannot escape responsibility for it. In apportioning the blame, I should for myself have been inclined to take the same proportions as TUCKER and SINGLETON, L.J.J., took in Henley v. Cameron (1), two-thirds to the unlighted vehicle and one-third to the approaching motor-cycle; but in deference to my
- H brothers, who think the plaintiff was very considerably to blame, I do not dissent from the proportion which has been suggested by COHEN, L.J.

SCOTT v. SCOTT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Birkett, L.J.J.), November 17, 1950.]

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Application to High Court—Injunction to prevent husband removing assets outside jurisdiction pending hearing of application—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949 (c. 100), s. 5 (1).

A
A wife, who had taken out an originating summons applying for maintenance under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5 (1), applied to the court for an injunction to prevent the husband from removing his assets outside the jurisdiction of the court pending the hearing of the application for maintenance.

HELD: although s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1949 gave a new right to a wife, viz., to apply to the High Court for maintenance by way of originating summons, and although, under s. 5 (2) of the Act, the court had power to secure any payments ordered to be made under s. 5 (1), the new legislation did not affect in any way the principle, which had been laid down by earlier authorities, that a court had no power to restrain a person from dealing with his property when no order against him had been made, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to grant the injunction. F
INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the wife from an order of WALLINGTON, J., dated Oct. 24, 1950, whereby he held that he had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to prevent the husband from removing his assets outside the jurisdiction of the court pending the hearing of an application by the wife for maintenance under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5.

G
The parties were married in 1931 and there were four children. On Sept. 15, 1950, the wife left the husband, taking two of the children with her. The husband paid her £10 a week, although he denied that he was liable to do so. On Oct. 19 the wife took out an originating summons applying for maintenance under s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1949, alleging cruelty by the husband. On Oct. 20, on an ex parte application by the wife, WALLINGTON, J., granted an interim injunction with effect from Oct. 21, 1950, restraining the husband from removing any of his assets outside the jurisdiction of the court pending the hearing and determination of the wife's application, and gave leave for short service of the summons for an injunction, which was to be returnable on Oct. 24. The summons was heard in open court, and it was contended on behalf of the wife (i) that the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 45 (1), was wide enough to entitle the court to grant an injunction in the terms asked for, and (ii) that the principle laid down by the earlier authorities, that an H injunction of this kind could not be granted, no longer applied because s. 5 (1) of the Act of 1949 conferred a new right on a wife which extended her power to make good her right to maintenance for herself and the children. WALLINGTON, J., held that, notwithstanding the fact that a new right had been conferred on a wife by s. 5 (1), he was bound by the earlier authorities which decided that s. 45 (1) of the Act of 1925 did not extend the jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction and laid down the principle that the court had

A no power to grant an injunction of the kind which was sought unless there was a subsisting order against the husband for payment of a sum of money by way of maintenance.

John Latey for the wife.

H. V. Brandon and Wakley for the husband.

B SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The question before us is one of jurisdiction. The wife's application for maintenance was made under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, s. 5, which provides:

C "(1) Where a husband has been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife or the infant children of the marriage, the High Court in England, if it would have jurisdiction to entertain proceedings by the wife for judicial separation, may, on the application of the wife, order the husband to make to her such periodical payments as may be just; and the order may be enforced in the same manner as an order for alimony in proceedings for judicial separation. (2) Where the court makes an order under this section for periodical payments it may,

D if it thinks fit, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the court, secure to the wife the periodical payments, and for that purpose may direct that a proper deed or instrument to be executed by all necessary parties shall be settled and approved by one of the conveyancing counsel of the court."

E Unaided by authorities I would have said that the decision of WALLINGTON, J., that he had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction before any order as contemplated by s. 5 (1) had been made was plainly right. The general principle of our law, that an injunction of this kind cannot be granted quia timet before some right to relief has been established, is well known, and, therefore, reading s. 5 of the Act of 1949 by itself and notwithstanding the fact that sub-s. (2) gives the court the power to secure the payments where an order under sub-s. (1) has been made, I would have said that, if the legislature had intended that a

F wife should be entitled to the safeguard for which the wife in the present case is applying—which (as counsel for the wife submitted) may be a very important one in some cases—it would have expressly so provided.

We are, however, not unaided by authorities. It has been held that an injunction of this kind cannot be granted under statutory provisions which,

G I agree, were different, but which seem to me for this purpose to be analogous. In Newton v. Newton (1) the headnote is:

"The court will not, in order to protect a wife's right to alimony, restrain a husband from removing his property out of the jurisdiction of the court before an order for alimony has been made."

H In a considered judgment SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., overruled Noakes v. Noakes and Hill (2), in which he had previously given a decision in a contrary sense. After examining the authorities, he considered the matter in the light of the principle and said (11 P.D. 13):

"... I come to the conclusion that as it has been decided that the Judicature Act [1873, s. 25 (8)*] does not give any enlarged powers to the court in this respect, it is not competent for a court, merely quia timet, to restrain a respondent from dealing with his property. The case would be different, of course, if the circumstances were the same as in Sidney v. Sidney (3). In that case that decision would be binding on me."

In Sidney v. Sidney (3) a decree absolute of marriage had been made in the wife's favour and the court had ordered permanent maintenance to be secured to her. On an application to MALINS, V.-C., an injunction was granted for her benefit to restrain the husband from dissipating his property for the purpose of putting it out of the control of the court. SIR JAMES HANNEN, P., said (11 P.D. 12) in Newton v. Newton (1):

"It is to be observed that in that case [Sidney v. Sidney (3)] there was, what there is not in this case, a subsisting order for the payment of the annuity."

The principle laid down in Newton v. Newton (1) was followed by SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., in Burmester v. Burmester (4), and by this court in Jagger v. Jagger (5), although in the latter case there were also other grounds on which SCRUTTON, L.J., and SARGANT, L.J., thought that the matter could be decided. In Jagger v. Jagger (5) SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1926] P. 102):

"I am not aware of any statutory or other power in the court to restrain a person from dealing with his property at a time when no order against him has been made."

In my judgment, the principle which is there stated stands in the way of the wife in the case now before us, and counsel for the wife is in a difficult position in asking us to disregard what has been so plainly approved by this court. I do not think that the distinctions which he emphasised between the position as it was before the Act of 1949 was passed and as it now is under s. 5 of the Act affect in any way the principle which was laid down in the cases to which I have referred. On the other hand, I think that the learned judge was right in saying that he had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction at this stage in the proceedings. For the reasons which I have given the appeal must be dismissed and the interim injunction treated as dissolved.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. Counsel for the wife contends that, whatever may be the effect of the earlier authorities which were cited to the learned judge and to us and with which SOMERVELL, L.J., has dealt, a new situation has arisen since the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1949, came into force, because s. 5 (1) thereof gave a new right to a wife, viz., to apply for maintenance in the High Court by way of originating summons. Because of this new right (counsel contends), the principle laid down by the earlier decisions no longer applies and the injunction should be granted. That a new right was given to a wife by the Act of 1949 admits of no doubt, but I do not think that it affects in any way the principle which has been laid down in the cases which have been cited. Therefore, I am of the opinion that WALLINGTON, J., had no jurisdiction to grant the injunction which was sought.

Appeal dismissed.

Costs—Taxation—Fatal accident—Action by administrator under Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934—Grant of administration obtained solely for purpose of action—Administration expenses, incidental to increased value of estate, incurred after judgment—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29).

A seaman lost his life as a result of a collision at sea for which the defendants were held partly to blame, and the administrator of his estate obtained judgment for damages and costs in respect of his death in an action brought against the defendants under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. Apart from the damages recovered in the action, the estate of the deceased was so small that no grant of administration would have been required, and the administrator obtained the grant solely to enable him to bring the action. As a result of the damages recovered under the Act of 1934, the estate of the deceased was so increased in value that it was necessary for the administrator to file a corrective affidavit and to incur additional expenses in connection with the administration of the estate, and he included these additional administration expenses in his bill of costs in the action. The registrar, while allowing the expenses incurred in obtaining the grant, disallowed the additional administration expenses incurred after the judgment. On appeal to the judge,

HELD: as the additional administration expenses incidental to the increase in value of the estate were incurred after the plaintiff had recovered judgment and were in no way necessary to enable him to conduct the litigation, they could not be allowed on taxation under R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), as costs of the action.

SUMMONS on a review of taxation adjourned into court for judgment.

H
A seaman, who lost his life as the result of an accident for which the defendants were held partly to blame, died intestate, but his estate was so small that no grant of administration would have been required. The plaintiff obtained a grant solely to bring an action against the defendants in respect of the death of the deceased, and he obtained judgment for damages and costs under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. On taxation of the costs of the action, the registrar allowed the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in obtaining the grant, but disallowed additional administration expenses, incidental to the increase in value of the estate, which were incurred after the judgment was given. The plaintiff appealed to the judge.

R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29) provides:

“ On every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence or mistake or by payment of special fees to counsel or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses."

Olson for the defendants.

WILLMER, J.: This was a summons for review of taxation in respect of the plaintiff's costs of an action brought by him, as administrator of the estate of a deceased seaman, against the defendants as owners of the steamship Queen Mary. The deceased seaman lost his life as a result of a collision between the Queen Mary and H.M.S. Curacao, for which collision the Queen Mary was held partly to blame. The question raised by the summons was one of some novelty, and it was represented to me that the same question was likely to arise in connection with a number of other similar claims pending against the defendants in connection with the same casualty. I have, therefore, thought it right to adjourn the summons into court for judgment, so that my decision may be given in public as a guide to those interested in similar claims.

The plaintiff recovered judgment for damages and costs in respect of the death of the deceased, under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. There was no recovery of damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts. All the damages recovered, therefore, were for the benefit of the estate of the deceased, of which the plaintiff was administrator. It appeared that, apart from the damages recovered in this action, the estate of the deceased was so small that no grant of administration would have been required. A grant of administration was, however, obtained by the plaintiff in 1945, solely to enable the present action to be brought. The expenses incurred in obtaining this grant were included in the plaintiff's bill of costs in the action and were allowed by the registrar as being costs necessarily incurred for the due prosecution of the action, and no question arises in relation to those costs. As a result, however, of the damages recovered under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, the estate of the deceased was materially increased in value. It became necessary for the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate, to file a corrective affidavit, and certain further expenses were necessarily and properly incurred in connection with the administration of the estate. These further expenses were also included in the plaintiff's bill of costs in the present action, but were disallowed by the registrar. The plaintiff now objects to the disallowance of these costs, which, it is contended, were properly incurred in the prosecution of the action.

According to the registrar's answers to the objections, the disallowance of the items in question is in accordance with the uniform practice of the taxing masters of the Supreme Court. No authority to the contrary was brought to my attention, and no reported case was cited in which expenses of this character have been allowed as part of the costs of an action brought by an administrator in similar circumstances, although since the Act of 1934 came into force there must have been many cases in which similar expenses had to be incurred. Notwithstanding the uniform practice to the contrary, however, it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that, in this and similar cases, the additional administration expenses incidental to the increase in value of the estate ought to be allowed as part of the costs of an action brought by the administrator against the wrongdoer who caused the death. It is pointed out that it is normal practice, in cases like the present, for the administrator to be required, on taking out the grant, to give an undertaking to file a corrective affidavit in the event of damages being recovered for the benefit of the estate. Although I am informed that in the present case no such undertaking was required to be given by the plaintiff, it is contended that he ought to be put in the same position as if such an undertaking had been given at the time of taking out the grant. On this basis it is argued that the expenses incurred after judgment in connection with the increased value of the estate ought to be counted as part of the expenses of obtaining the grant, and as such should be allowed as costs properly incurred for the purpose of prosecuting the action.

I was referred by both sides to Feay v. Barnwell (1), but it appears to me that the decision in that case has very little relevance to the question now under consideration. It is authority for the proposition that, in assessing the amount by which an award of damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts ought to be reduced where damages are also awarded under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, regard may properly be had to the administration expenses which must necessarily be incurred in connection with the estate of the deceased. No suggestion was made in that case that expenses of the kind here in question could be dealt with as part of the costs of the action.

In my opinion, it is impossible to get away from the fact that the expenses here in question were incurred after the plaintiff had successfully prosecuted his action to judgment, and were in no sense necessary to enable him to obtain that judgment. It appears to me to be impossible notionally to ante-date these expenses and to treat them as part of the expenses of obtaining the grant, which they clearly are not. To do so would, in my view, be quite contrary to the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). It was laid down by SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C. (L.R. 19 Eq. 475), in Smith v. Buller (2):

“ . . . the costs chargeable under a taxation as between party and party are all that are necessary to enable the adverse party to conduct the litigation, and no more.”

The costs here sought to be included were in no wise necessary to enable the plaintiff to conduct the litigation. They were incurred after the litigation was over, so as to enable the estate, increased in value as it was as the result of the litigation, to be properly administered. The defendants, however, had no concern with that, any more than they would have had if expenses had to be subsequently incurred in consequence of disputes arising between rival claimants over the distribution of the assets. In my judgment, the learned registrar, in disallowing these costs, came to a correct conclusion, and, accordingly, I dismiss the plaintiff's objections.

Application dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Dénning and Birkett, L.JJ.), November 16, 17, 1950.]

Nuisance—Premises adjoining highway—Dwelling-house—Weekly tenancy—Collapse of wall—No express provision as to repairs—No right of entry reserved to landlord—Liability of landlord—Implication of right—Effect of Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 16 (2).

A wall separating from a public highway the forecourt of two houses within the Rent Restrictions Acts collapsed on the public footpath and injured the infant plaintiff who was thereon. The defective condition of the wall, which was due to lack of repair, could have been ascertained by inspection. The houses were let on weekly tenancies under oral agreements to different tenants. No express provision was made in the agreements with regard to the liability for repairs and the landlord reserved no right of entry to effect repairs, but he had from time to time carried out repairs. In an action for damages against the landlord,

HELD: in the absence of evidence or of express stipulation to the contrary it was to be implied in an agreement for a weekly tenancy which was silent on the matter a term that the premises let would be kept in a reasonable and habitable condition by the landlord and that he would have the right to enter and effect necessary repairs; the duty of the landlord in the present case was to see that the wall was as safe as reasonable care could make it, and it was immaterial whether or not he had knowledge of the danger of its collapsing; and, therefore, he was liable to the infant plaintiff in damages.

Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. ([1940] 3 All E.R. 634), Wringe v. Cohen ([1939] 4 All E.R. 241), and dictum of LORD PORTER in McCarrick v. Liverpool Corpn. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 647), applied.

Stocker v. Planet Building Society (1879) (27 W.R. 877) and Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan ([1940] 3 All E.R. 349), distinguished.

Per SOMERVELL, L.J.: There is great force in the view that s. 16 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, does not import into a tenancy to which it applies a condition which is equivalent in form and consequences to an express reservation by the landlord of a right of access and entry to effect repairs. The sub-section only applies to a tenancy under which the landlord is entitled to execute repairs. In the present case the landlord was not so entitled.

Per DENNING, L.J.: (i) Even if the landlord of premises let at a rack-rent has no strict right (express or implied) to enter, but has been given permission to enter whenever he has asked, he should be held liable for damage caused to a passer-by because of lack of repair.

(ii) It is doubtful whether a landlord can now exempt himself from liability to passers-by by taking a covenant from the tenant to repair the structure adjoining the highway.

Quaere whether Pretty v. Bickmore (1873) (L.R. 8 C.P. 401) is still good law.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of STABLE, J., dated May 3, 1950, dismissing his action for damages for personal injuries against the owner of certain premises adjoining the highway. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Sir Godfrey Russell Vick, K.C., and Buckee for the plaintiff.

P. M. O'Connor for the defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of STABLE, J., in a claim made on behalf of the infant plaintiff for personal injuries caused by an alleged nuisance.

On Apr. 25, 1948, the infant plaintiff, who was then ten years old, was injured by the collapse of a wall on a footpath, which was a highway for the purposes of the law. It was a low wall separating the forecourt of two houses from the footpath. The defendant is the landlord of the houses, which were let on weekly tenancies, the occupiers, who are, prima facie, the persons liable in nuisance, not having been sued. The learned judge found that there was a nuisance, and (although this may not matter in view of the law which has been laid down and is binding on this court) that a reasonable examination would have detected the defective condition of the wall. It was not a latent defect, and it was due to lack of repair. There was no contract by the landlord with his tenant to do any repairs, and there was no obligation on the tenant to do any repairs. The learned judge held that the landlord was not liable, because he had not specifically reserved the right to enter on the property.

In Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1), in somewhat similar circumstances proceedings were brought in nuisance against a landlord for injury sustained by the plaintiff while on a highway. The headnote in the case says ([1940] 2 K.B. 476):

“In order that a person injured while proceeding along a highway by the defective condition of premises alongside it may be entitled to sue the landlord instead of the occupying tenant for personal injuries, it is not necessary that the landlord should have covenanted with the tenant to do the external repairs; it is sufficient that he has reserved the right to enter on and view the premises and to do all necessary repairs.”

The judgment of the court was given by MACKINNON, L.J., and he said ([1940] 3 All E.R. 637):

“It was held by GODDARD, J., in Wilchick v. Marks & Silverstone (2) that, where a third party had been injured by the lack of repair of a house, and the landlords had not covenanted to do the repairs but had reserved a right to enter and do the repairs if they thought fit, that was sufficient to give the damaged third party a direct right of action against the landlord, and it did not merely limit him to a right against the occupier. GODDARD, J., added to that suggested rule of liability a proviso that it could arise only in a case where the landlord knew, or had notice, of the defect or lack of repair in the property in question. That qualification or condition that the landlord must know that repairs are wanted or that the defect is existing, has, I think, been said to be incorrect in Wringe v. Cohen (3). If that qualification is taken away, then the decision of GODDARD, J., otherwise, I think, approved in this court, seems to me to cover the position of Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd., in the present case. GODDARD, J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 67): ‘If I use a highway the duty I am under not to injure other persons is not special or contractual, but general, arising from what LORD ESHER used to call proximity. A property owner knows that his house if not repaired must at some time get into a dangerous state: he lets it to a tenant and puts him under no obligation to keep it repaired: it may be the tenant is one who from lack of means could not do any repairs. The landlord has expressly reserved to himself the right to enter and do necessary repairs: why then should he be under no duty to make it safe for passers by when he knows that the property is dangerous? The proximity is there: he has the right to enter and remedy a known danger. Is the injured person to be left in such a case only to a remedy against the tenant? In view of the later expression of opinion in Wringe v. Cohen (3), that passage has to be read omitting the words which I read: 'When he knows that the property is dangerous.' If one omits those words, that statement of GODDARD, J., exactly covers the position in this case. 'The landlord has expressly reserved to himself the right to enter and do necessary repairs: why then should he be under no duty to make it safe for passers by? The proximity is there: he had the right to enter and remedy a known danger. Is the injured person to be left in such a case with a remedy only against the tenant?' "

That decision, of course, binds this court unless it is inconsistent with some other decision or cannot stand with some decision of the House of Lords. I propose to proceed on the basis, in the first instance, that it does bind this court. The important words for the purpose of this case are "the landlord has expressly reserved to himself a right to enter." No such right to enter was expressly reserved in this case.

Counsel for the defendant referred to those words, "the landlord has expressly reserved to himself." It seems to me that the same principle must apply if a landlord has reserved to himself the right, whether he has done so impliedly or expressly. I cannot envisage any principle by which a landlord should be in one position in the case of an express reservation and in a different position in the case of an implied reservation. The question, therefore, here is whether, in the circumstances, a right to enter on and view the premises and do necessary repairs is to be implied. I would have said that there is no term which would be more easily and more necessarily implied by law in a tenancy of this kind than a right in the landlord to enter, to examine the premises, and to do necessary repairs. It must be in the contemplation of both parties to a weekly tenancy that the tenant will not be called on to do repairs, although the Rent Restrictions Acts have rather altered the position. Both sides must contemplate as the basis of the contract that the house will be kept in a reasonable and habitable condition by the landlord and not by the tenant, and, although the landlord does not bind himself to do so, both sides contemplate that he will have the right to enter and look after his property by doing repairs.

Counsel for the defendant has referred us on another part of his argument to McCarrick v. Liverpool Corpn. (4) which contains a statement by LORD PORTER with regard to weekly tenancies which I think is useful. It bears out the line of approach which I have just indicated, although not with regard to the subject-matter with which we are dealing here. The House of Lords were there considering the construction of the Housing Act, 1936, which put on the landlord a liability to repair in certain circumstances, and the question was whether he came under any liability until he had notice. In the course of his speech LORD PORTER said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 647):

"My Lords, in construing this statute its exact terms must be considered. It does not impose extraneously a duty on the landlord. It merely inserts a term into the tenancy agreement, and this term then becomes part of the contract between the parties, whether they wish it or not. In such a tenancy there is no reason why any term should not be implied provided it is necessary to secure the business efficacy of the contract and it is not contrary to the provisions of the Act."

A It seems to me necessary for the business efficacy of a contract for the weekly tenancy of a house that the landlord should have the right which I have defined, and in the present case I think that that receives additional support from the facts. Any house which has, as this house had, something adjoining the highway which may become a nuisance will render the occupier prima facie liable if the nuisance occurs and causes damage, and that gives the occupier another reason for desiring that the landlord should have the power to keep the place in proper repair and prevent his (the occupier's) becoming liable to passers-by for nuisance. That is the conclusion to which I would have come in the absence of authority, and I asked counsel for the defendant what B was the best authority he could find which would suggest that I would be wrong in coming to that conclusion. He referred us to Stocker v. Planet Building Society (5), the headnote of which states (27 W.R. 877):

C "A lessor who, in the absence of express power in the lease, enters upon the demised premises to repair them on breach of the lessee's covenant to repair, even though under a superior lease the lessor is liable to forfeiture for non-repair and though he enters by leave of weekly sub-tenants, commits a trespass which will be restrained by injunction."

D It is plain that in that case the lease which was being considered was in writing and contained covenants dealing with repair, usual, no doubt, in a lease of that length, the tenant having the liability to repair. There was a power of re-entry on breach, but no power for the lessor to do repairs on the tenant's default. JAMES, L.J., said (ibid., 878):

E "Where a reversioner has granted a lease with no power of re-entry reserved on breach of a covenant to repair, can he give himself the right to enter and do the repairs? It is a plain invasion of the rights of property. He has no more right than any stranger has."

F I agree that, if he has not the right expressly or impliedly, he cannot do it. I am not dealing with tenancies longer than weekly tenancies or where there are written documents expressly dealing with repair and re-entry, particularly if they are in conveyancing terms, nor am I dealing with all weekly tenancies. With regard to some weekly tenancies there may be express evidence that the parties had contracted on the basis of certain terms which either would exclude, or make more difficult, the implication which I make in the present case, but there being, as I see, no authority which prevents the implication in a case of this kind, it seems to me proper that the landlord's right to enter should be implied, and I think the implication is reinforced by the fact that the evidence shows that the landlord had previously done repairs. I do not think it would be right to base one's self on that, because, no doubt, the repairs might have been done by licence. Whether or not there was a right of re-entry, the occupying tenant would be very unlikely to seek to exercise a right to prevent the landlord putting the house in a better condition than it would otherwise be. So much for the first point, assuming that Wringe v. Cohen (3) is applicable and binds this court.

H Council for the defendant, however, submits, in view of two decisions on which he relies, and on the basis of certain inconsistencies in Wringe v. Cohen (3), that we should not regard ourselves as bound either by that case or by Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1). In Wringe v. Cohen (3) it was held ([1940] 1 K.B. 229):

"If, owing to want of repair, premises on a highway become dangerous and constitute a nuisance, so that they collapse and injure a passer-by or an adjoining owner, the occupier or owner of the premises, if he has undertaken the duty to repair, is answerable, whether he knew or ought to have known of the danger or not."

Counsel submits that the case must proceed on the basis that the landlord neither knew, nor ought to have known, and, therefore, if Wringe v. Cohen (3) is wrong, the defendant in this case should not be held liable.

I will deal first with the internal criticisms. Counsel submitted, I think rightly, that there is probably a mistake in a reference ([1939] 4 All E.R. 247) to a note in POLLOCK ON TORTS, 14th ed., p. 417, but the judgment does not base itself solely on that. He submitted (I did not think there was much force in this) that the court had not really understood the ratio of BLACKBURN, J.'s decision in Tarry v. Ashton (6), but, in any event, I do not think those are grounds, even if they were substantiated, and I do not think they were, which would entitle us to disregard this decision. It is a perfectly plain decision laying down perfectly plain principles, and even if it could be shown that, in reviewing the authorities to see whether any of them were inconsistent with the principles being laid down, there had been some misunderstanding of some earlier case, that would not affect the matter. Apart from the note in POLLOCK, counsel did not satisfy me that there was any misunderstanding. Counsel then said that Wringe v. Cohen (3) could not stand with the decision of the House of Lords in Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (7). That case dealt with a different type of nuisance, and the distinction has been pointed out in more than one passage in the cases which have been read to us. Wringe v. Cohen (3) related to a nuisance arising from a failure to maintain property in repair; Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (7) is an example of a case where the nuisance comes into existence by the act of a trespasser and the question is in what circumstances the occupier becomes liable? It seems to me that those two different classes of cases may raise different principles. One has only to study them to see that one class may fall on one side of a line, and the other class on the other. It would seem obvious in the case of a nuisance created by a trespasser that it would be very hard if the occupier was held liable half-an-hour afterwards if he had no knowledge of the existence of any danger. Therefore, having regard to the subject-matter, I do not think Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (7) could possibly be treated by this court as overruling Wringe v. Cohen (3).

Counsel also particularly relied on McCarrick v. Liverpool Corpn. (4), to which I have already referred in another connection. There, again, the court was dealing with a completely different subject-matter, viz., the position as between landlord and tenant, a statute having imposed on the landlord obligations to repair in circumstances in which they were not already imposed by the contract of tenancy, and it was held that the landlord was under no liability until he had notice. Counsel submitted it would be illogical if the tenant could not make any claim in respect of damage for want of repair unless the landlord had notice, but a person on the highway could. I do not myself see any illogicality in that, but, even if there is illogicality, it would not, in my view, entitle us to disregard Wringe v. Cohen (3). At the highest it would be an argument which could be addressed to the House of Lords in the event of their ever being asked to consider what was laid down in Wringe v. Cohen (3). Counsel for the defendant has failed to satisfy me that we can do anything other than apply the law as laid down in Wringe v. Cohen (3) and Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1).

STABLE, J., having considered Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1), said:

"In this case I am quite satisfied that the landlord had reserved no right to enter on either No. 193 or No. 195 for the purpose of doing repairs, or, indeed, for any purpose at all."

That is where I part company with the learned judge. For the reasons which I have given, I think this right is to be implied.

In those circumstances, it becomes unnecessary to consider a further point which was raised under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 16 (2), and it is unnecessary for me to say any more about it except that I think there is great force in the view which the learned judge expressed on that point.* For these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: The law of England has always taken particular care to protect those who use a highway. It puts on the occupier of adjoining premises a special responsibility for the structures which he keeps beside the highway. If those structures fall into disrepair so as to be a potential danger to passers-by, they become a nuisance, and, what is more, a public nuisance, and the occupier is liable to anyone using the highway who is injured by reason of the disrepair. It is no answer for him to say that he and his servants took reasonable care, for, even if he has employed a competent independent contractor to repair the structure, and has every reason for supposing it to be safe, the occupier is still liable if the independent contractor did the work badly: see Tarry v. Ashton (6). The occupier's duty to passers-by is to see that the structure is as safe as reasonable care can make it—a duty which is as high as the duty which an occupier owes to people who pay to come on his premises. He is not liable for latent defects which could not be discovered by reasonable care on the part of anyone, nor for acts of trespassers of which he neither knew nor ought to have known: see Barker v. Herbert (8); but he is liable when structures fall into dangerous disrepair, because there must be some fault on

* On this question, STABLE, J., said: Counsel for the plaintiff referred to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 16 (2), which provides:

“It shall be deemed to be a condition of the tenancy of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies that the tenant shall afford to the landlord access thereto and all reasonable facilities for executing therein any repairs which the landlord is entitled to execute.”

He argued that this sub-section imports into the tenancy a condition exactly equivalent in form and in all its consequences to an express reservation by the landlord of a right of access and entry for the purpose of effecting repairs. That seems to me to be a most revolutionary alteration in the law. One cannot, unless one is driven to it, put such an interpretation on that sub-section if the effect is that in every case where there is house property within the scope of the Act, albeit the landlord has not covenanted to do any repairs nor reserved any right to enter the property for the purpose of repairing it or otherwise, and, perhaps, even where the tenant has expressly covenanted to do the repairs, the landlord is to be made responsible for the injuries sustained by third persons as a result of a nuisance arising from the defective state of the property, notwithstanding the fact that he might have no knowledge at all or only when told by the tenant that the property was defective. In my view, a sub-section of that kind in this highly specialised Act cannot possibly have been intended to affect, and does not affect, the position of a landlord in relation to third parties in a matter lying entirely outside the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The condition of the tenancy that is imported is that the tenant should afford to the landlord access to the dwelling-house and all reasonable facilities for executing therein any repairs which he is entitled to execute. I think that, unless one can put one's finger on some repairs which the landlord is entitled to execute as a matter of right, this sub-section has no operation. In the present case the landlord had no right to execute any repairs. He had parted with the property which was in the exclusive occupation of the tenants and the tenancies were only weekly ones. So far as the authorities are concerned on this particular point, there are none, but I was referred to the judgment of LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in Morgan v. Liverpool Corpn. ([1927] 2 K.B. 131). LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid., 140): “. . . throughout the whole code laid down by these [Rent Restrictions] Acts there does not appear to me to be an implication that one is to take those Acts as incorporated into tenancies and to find an alteration of the relation between landlord and tenant which is to be implied from their terms. The Acts appear to me to have been passed alio intuitu.” I may say that a fortiori it does not appear to me to be an implication that one is to take those Acts as effecting a substantial alteration of the relation between the owner of a reversion, or a landlord, and third parties who have been injured by the failure of the occupier to keep his property in such a state of repair as not to constitute a nuisance, including, of course, injury to third persons on a highway.

the part of someone for that to happen and he is responsible for it to persons using the highway, even though he was not actually at fault himself. That principle was laid down in this court in Wringe v. Cohen (3) ([1939] 4 All E.R. 243), where it is to be noted that the principle is confined to "premises on a highway."

The question in this case is whether the owner, as well as the occupier, is under a like duty to passers-by. I think he is. The law has shown a remarkable development on this point during the last sixteen years. The three cases of Wilchick v. Marks & Silverstone (2), Wringe v. Cohen (3), and Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1), show that the courts are now taking a realistic view of these matters. They recognise that the occupying tenant of a small dwelling-house does not in practice do the structural repairs, but the owner does, and that, if a passer-by is injured by the structure being in dangerous disrepair, the occupier has not the means to pay damages, but the owner has, or, at any rate, he can insure against it. If a passer-by is injured by the structure falling on him, he should be entitled to damages from someone, and the person who ought to pay is the owner, because he is in practice responsible for the repairs. Just as, in a practical world, masters are responsible to third persons for the faults of their servants, so also should owners, who let houses at a rackrent, be responsible to passers-by for the safety of the structures out of which the rent issues. Parliament has long made them responsible for nuisances under the Public Health Acts, 1875 to 1936, and I think the time has now come when the common law should make them responsible for public nuisances due to the disrepair of the structure.

This seems to me to be a logical consequence of the cases to which we have been referred. In Wilchick v. Marks & Silverstone (2) the landlord had covenanted to repair. In Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1) he had not covenanted to repair, but had reserved a right to enter. In the present case he has not reserved a right to enter, but he has in practice always done the structural repairs. I cannot think that the liability of the owner to passers-by depends on the precise terms of the tenancy agreement between the owner and the tenant. That is no concern of the passer-by. If a landlord is liable when he reserves an express right to enter, he is also liable when he has an implied right. Even if he has no strict right, but has been given permission to enter whenever he asks, it should make no difference. The landlord has in practice taken the structural repairs on himself and should be responsible for any disrepair.

That is sufficient for the decision of this case, but I venture to doubt in these days whether a landlord can exempt himself from liability to passers-by by taking a covenant from a tenant to repair the structure adjoining the highway. I know that in Pretty v. Bickmore (9) a landlord managed to escape liability for a coal-plate which was in dangerous disrepair, because he took from the tenant a covenant to repair. I doubt whether he would escape liability to-day. The liability of the owner is a liability in tort and cannot be affected by the terms of the agreement between himself and his tenant. Just as a manufacturer who is liable under the principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson (10) cannot exempt himself from liability to the public by the terms of his contract with the wholesaler, so also I should doubt whether a property owner could exempt himself by the terms of his contract with the tenant. In this case the learned judge found that the condition of the wall was a nuisance and that a reasonable examination by a competent person would have detected the condition in which it was. That means that the duty of the landlord to see that the structure was as safe as reasonable care could make it was not fulfilled. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. In the course of the argument counsel for the defendant, I thought, conceded that, save for one matter, the facts in this case were on all fours with those in Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1). The one matter which differentiated the present case was that in Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1) the landlord had expressly reserved to himself the right to enter on the premises at any time to do the repairs, while in this case there was no such term. It was on that point that the decision in the court below turned. I understood counsel also to agree that if the obstacle in the present case that there was no express reservation, whereas in Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1) there was, could be surmounted, this case would be on all fours with Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1), with the consequence that that case would be binding on this court and would be fatal to counsel's contention. I am of opinion that in this case that obstacle is overcome by implying a term giving the right of entry. My Lord dealt in some detail with the reasons why that appears in this case to be a necessary implication, and I will not attempt to re-state them. It is enough for me to say that I most fully agree with them, and, that being so, the only difference between the present case and Heap v. Ind Coope & Allsopp, Ltd. (1) is removed.

I agree with what has been said about the importance of the public highway cases, and it is at least some satisfaction to think that in the case of a weekly tenancy of this kind an innocent member of the public who is injured on the highway through no fault of his own by a defect in the premises may, under our law, as it is now interpreted, be able to recover.

Appeal allowed.

BAILEY v. BULLOCK AND OTHERS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Barry, J.), October 5, 6, 13, 1950.]

Contract—Breach—Damages—Measure—Inconvenience and discomfort—Annoyance and mental distress—Loss of social prestige—Decision by husband and wife not to have child.

Solicitor—Breach of duty—Client's action founded in contract—Measure of damages.

The plaintiff owned a dwelling-house which he let to B., and he was also the proprietor of an hotel in which he resided. In 1947 he sold the hotel, giving up possession on July 6, 1947. He desired to regain possession of the house for his occupation, and in June, 1947, he instructed S., the managing clerk of the defendants (a firm of solicitors), to press urgently for possession. S., who had acted in the sale of the hotel, was aware of the fact that the plaintiff and his wife and child had no other living accommodation. The plaintiff sought temporary shelter in the small house of his wife's parents, where he, his wife, and their child shared one bedroom, but S. took no steps to obtain possession of the house until Dec. 31, 1948, when he served a notice to quit, having in the meanwhile followed an elaborate system of deception by means of which he persuaded the plaintiff that a summons had been issued and that there were genuine reasons for the failure of the matter to come before the court. On Mar. 31, 1949, the plaintiff, who had repeatedly pressed for information and expedition, discovered the deception and consulted other solicitors, obtaining possession of the house soon afterwards. In an action against the defendants for negligence, and/or breach of duty, in which the defendants admitted breach of duty, the plaintiff claimed damages for the inconvenience and discomfort to which he had been subjected.

HELD: (i) the plaintiff's claim was founded in contract rather than in tort.

Groom v. Crocker ([1938] 2 All E.R. 394), applied.

(ii) the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for the inconvenience and discomfort which he had suffered as a direct result of the defendants' breach of contract.

Burton v. Pinkerton (1867) (L.R. 2 Exch. 340) and Hobbs v. London and South-Western Ry. Co. (1875) (L.R. 10 Q.B. 111), applied.

But (a) the plaintiff could not recover in respect of the annoyance and mental distress which he had suffered.

Groom v. Crocker (supra) and Addis v. Gramophone Co., Ltd. ([1909] A.C. 488), applied.

or (b) in respect of the fact that the plaintiff and his wife, in view of their lack of living accommodation, had not thought it possible for them to have another child.

ACTION for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty.

The plaintiff, an hotel proprietor, was the owner of a dwelling-house and property, subject to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, at 172, Woodcock Hill, Kenton, Middlesex, which he had let on a weekly tenancy to a tenant at a rent of £1 15s. a week. In 1946, wishing to sell the house at the enhanced price obtainable with vacant possession, he instructed the defendants to institute proceedings for possession. On Feb. 26, 1947, the action was dismissed owing to an omission to serve a valid notice to quit. The plaintiff assumed from a conversation with a managing clerk of the defendants, Mr. Simmonds, that fresh proceedings would be instituted. In 1947 the plaintiff sold his hotel (in which he was living), giving up possession on July 6. He informed Mr. Simmonds, who had acted for him in the sale, that he had nowhere to go except to his parents-in-law, and said that he wished to live in his own house as soon as an order for possession could be obtained. He emphasised that possession of his house was urgently required, repeatedly pressed for news of the progress of his action, and made plain the serious consequences of delay. He was assured that proceedings had been commenced, but, in fact, notice to quit was not served until Dec. 31, 1948, and the tenant's solicitors were not informed of the intention to commence proceedings until Jan. 6, 1949. On Mar. 31, 1949, the plaintiff discovered that no proceedings had been commenced. He instructed fresh solicitors, commenced proceedings, and in due course obtained possession of his house. He claimed damages against the defendants for breach of duty arising from the conduct of their managing clerk. The plaintiff claimed as special damages the cost of storing his furniture, garage expenses and doctor's fees paid in respect of an illness of his wife which, he alleged, resulted from the strain of the difficult living conditions at his wife's parents' home, and he also claimed general damages in respect of the inconvenience and discomfort which he had suffered. The defendants admitted the breach of the contractual duty which they owed to the plaintiff, and disputed the claim for special damages (except those claimed in respect of the wife's illness) only as to amount, but they resisted the claim for general damages.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 13. BARRY, J., stated the facts, held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the reasonable cost of storing furniture and also his garage expenses reasonably incurred, subject to the deduction of an amount equivalent to that of the general and water rates which would have been payable by him in respect of his house during the relevant period if he had been in occupation of it, but that the expenses of the wife's illness were too remote, and continued: I now turn to the one important issue in this case. In addition to the items of special damage to which I have just referred, counsel for the plaintiff contends that his client is entitled to recover substantial damages for the inconvenience and discomfort to which he has been subjected as a result of this admitted breach of duty on the part of the defendants. Counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, submitted that the plaintiff's claim—however framed—was in essence a claim founded on contract, and that, in assessing the damages for this breach of contract, the court can compensate the plaintiff only for the actual pecuniary loss which he has sustained and proved and can allow him nothing by way of general damages in respect of the inconvenience and discomfort he has suffered, even though he establishes that this inconvenience and discomfort were the direct results of the defendants' breach.

That the plaintiff's claim is founded in contract rather than tort is, I think, beyond doubt. The Court of Appeal, following a number of earlier decisions, decided in Groom v. Crocker (1) that the mutual rights and duties of a solicitor and his client are regulated by the contract of employment, and that, in the absence of any duty other than that imposed by the contract, a solicitor is not liable to his client in tort. Counsel for the plaintiff did not seriously dispute this proposition, and I am satisfied that in the present case the plaintiff can only recover such damages as may be properly awarded for a breach or series of breaches of contractual duty.

In contending that damages for breach of contract may not include compensation for inconvenience and discomfort, however real and however serious, counsel for the defendants principally relied on certain passages in their lordships' judgments given in Groom v. Crocker (1). SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said ([1938] 2 All E.R. 401):

"It was said that, as the result of the negligence on the part of the appellants, the respondent was subjected to mental suffering, that he was held up to public disapproval, and that his reputation as a careful driver was destroyed, and that the jury were entitled to award damages in respect of these matters. It was said that the action was an action in tort and not in contract, and that, even if it were an action in contract, such damages were recoverable."

The Master of the Rolls goes on to discuss the question whether the claim is truly founded in contract or tort and says (ibid., 402):

"No authority was cited to us which supports the proposition that, in an action based on breach of contract, damages can be recovered in respect of the matters to which I have referred. No pecuniary loss arose from them, and no reasonable probability of pecuniary loss in the future could be shown."

SCOTT, L.J., said (ibid., 415):

"As regards the £1,000 damages for which he got judgment, however, I feel bound to differ from the judge. I do not think there was any evidence of pecuniary loss such as might be recoverable as special damage for breach of contract; and against general damages for injury to his reputation or his feelings, Addis v. Gramophone Co., Ltd. (2) is, I think, a conclusive authority. The cases cited to us by Mr. Pritt do not, in my opinion, sustain his contentions that 'general' damages are recoverable even in contract so as to put the amount at large for the jury to assess as in tort for defamation or negligence."

He then refers to the somewhat peculiar case of a bank dishonouring a cheque, and goes on (ibid.):

"However serious to the respondent was the result of the very real breach of contract committed—and I have much sympathy with him—I think that the £1,000 must be reduced to 40s. as nominal damages, although I share the regret expressed by the Master of the Rolls."

Lastly, MACKINNON, L.J., says (ibid., 418):

"Next, as to the £1,000 damages for breach of duty. I am clear that this is a claim for damages for breach of contract, and that the plaintiff can recover only the pecuniary loss that he can show that he has suffered. He can prove no such loss in this case. Therefore, the damages must be reduced to 40s."

The court was there considering a case in which the jury had awarded substantial damages for injuries to the plaintiff's reputation and feelings, and, reaching the conclusion that they did, they were guided by the authority of the House of Lords in Addis v. Gramophone Co., Ltd. (2). This was the second case on which counsel for the defendants relied in support of his argument, but again the damages which were sought to be recovered were damages for injured feelings and loss of reputation alleged to have arisen from wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff.

In my judgment, it is fallacious to divorce the judgments in these two cases from their particular context, and, to support a wider proposition of law to which the mind of the court was not directed, to rely on the generality of some of the expressions which may have been used. It is clear from these two authorities that the plaintiff cannot recover damages for the annoyance or mental distress which he may have suffered as a result of the defendants' default, nor can he be compensated for any loss of social prestige which may have fallen on him through being so long a lodger in his father-in-law's house instead of being an independent householder living with his family in his own establishment. Indeed, if I understand his argument aright, counsel for the plaintiff does not suggest that his client should be awarded damages under these heads. On the other hand, I am equally satisfied that in the two cases I have mentioned neither the House of Lords nor the Court of Appeal intended to, or did, in fact, overrule or question the authority of a number of earlier decisions, which, in my judgment, make it abundantly clear that damages may be recovered for substantial inconvenience and discomfort caused by a breach of contract. In particular, I refer to Burton v. Pinkerton (3) and Hobbs v. London and South-Western Ry. Co. (4), both of which cases were cited and relied on by counsel for the plaintiff.

To my mind, there is a very real difference between mere annoyance and injury to feelings, on the one hand, and physical inconvenience, on the other. This difference is made clear in a short passage in the judgment of MELLOR, J., in Hobbs' case (4), where he says (L.R. 10 Q.B. 122):

A "I quite agree with my brother PARRY, that for the mere inconvenience, such as annoyance and loss of temper, or vexation, or for being disappointed in a particular thing which you have set your mind upon, without real physical inconvenience resulting, you cannot recover damages. That is purely sentimental, and not a case where the word inconvenience, as I here use it, would apply. But I must say, if it is a fact that you arrived at a place where you did not intend to go to, where you are placed, by reason of the breach of contract of the carriers, at a considerable distance from your destination, the case may be otherwise. It is admitted that if there be a carriage you may hire it and ride home and charge the expense to the defendants. The reason why you may hire a carriage and charge the expense to the company is with the view simply of mitigating the inconvenience to which you would otherwise be subject; so that where the inconvenience is real and substantial arising from being obliged to walk home, I cannot see why that should not be capable of being assessed as damages in respect of inconvenience."

C The other members of the court deciding Hobbs' case (4) delivered judgments in the same sense, and the court was clearly of opinion that in a case based on a breach of contract alone damages could be awarded for serious physical inconvenience and discomfort.

D During the course of the argument before me, counsel for the defendants was disposed to admit that if in the present case the plaintiff had chosen to mitigate the discomfort to which he was subjected by taking rooms for himself and his family at an hotel or making other arrangements for his accommodation, it would have been extremely difficult for the defendants to have resisted a claim for special damages based on the cost of such accommodation. It would, indeed, be curious if, in the circumstances of this case, because the plaintiff suffered the inconvenience rather than incur expense to avoid it, he should be deprived of any remedy. Such, in my opinion, is not the law. I consider that Hobbs' case (4) and Burton v. Pinkerton (3) clearly establish that in a proper case damages for personal inconvenience may be recoverable in an action of this kind.

E It, therefore, remains for me to consider whether in the present case the plaintiff has proved that he did in truth suffer substantial inconvenience and that this inconvenience was a direct result of the defendants' breach, and, lastly, that the damage which he has suffered is not too remote to be recoverable, or, in other words, whether his inconvenience should have been reasonably contemplated by the defendants as a probable result of their failure to perform their contractual duties. On the evidence there can be only one possible answer to these three questions. The plaintiff has given me detailed evidence as to the conditions obtaining in his parents-in-law's house during the long period that he was forced to reside there. He and his wife had a small boy, then aged, F I think, about six. They were compelled, all three of them, to share one bedroom. Then, his father-in-law and mother-in-law were both elderly people, one seventy-one and the other seventy. He has described to me in detail the discomforts and inconveniences of the life which he was forced to live for so long a time. He has told me that as a result of this mode of life he and his wife did not think it possible for them to have another child, but that is not, G I think, a matter to which I can properly attach weight when assessing the damages which the plaintiff should receive. That this discomfort and inconvenience were the direct result of the defendants' negligence appears to me to be obvious. It was the duty of the defendants to take proper steps to obtain possession of the plaintiff's house. They failed to do so, and as a direct consequence he had either to live in discomfort or to spend money in obtaining alternative accommodation. That this inconvenience and discomfort were likely to arise from the defendants' breach of duty was brought home to them H in no uncertain terms by letters written by the plaintiff. This is not a case in which they ought to have contemplated that these consequences would result from their breach; it is a case in which the consequences of the breach were brought to their notice in the clearest possible terms. In assessing the damages for discomfort and inconvenience of this nature, I must not be extravagant. Taking all the circumstances into account, I think that the proper sum to award the plaintiff under this head is the sum of £300.

DEVINE v. LONDON HOUSING SOCIETY, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Croom-Johnson, J.), November 2, 3, 10, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—Access to demised premises—Maintenance—Duty of landlord—Stairway—Lighting.

In an action against the landlord for damages for personal injuries resulting from a fall on a staircase during the hours of darkness the tenant of a flat contended that her accident was caused by a breach of the contract of tenancy. The flat was on the seventh floor of a block of flats, and in the tenancy agreement there was no express undertaking by the landlords to provide any means of access to the demised flat or to light or keep in order the staircase. Before September, 1939, the landlords kept the staircase lighted until late at night, but during the war only pin-point lamps outside the door of the lift were provided on each landing. In 1945, when war-time restrictions were removed, the lighting was partly restored, and by 1947 it was the same as before the war. In 1948, to save current, the landlords installed a system of automatic control by means of a clock, but this system worked erratically.

HELD: the stairway was a way of necessity to enable the tenant to reach the demised premises; there was an obligation on the landlords to keep the stairway reasonably safe for the use of the tenant; but in the circumstances of the present case there was not to be implied in the tenancy agreement a covenant by the landlords to maintain a reasonable standard of lighting on the staircase, and they were not liable for breach of the agreement.

ACTION for damages for breach of contract and, alternatively, for negligence.

The tenant was the weekly tenant of a one-roomed flat on the seventh floor of a block of flats at 50, Queen Alexandra Mansions, Judge Street, London. There was no undertaking by the landlords in the contract of tenancy to provide any means of access to the demised flat or to keep in order the common staircase or to light or to maintain a system of lighting. A lift was provided, but only to the sixth floor. To reach her flat, therefore, the tenant had to use the staircase. On May 28, 1949, she was ascending from the sixth to the seventh floors in the dark when she stumbled on the stairs, fell, and was injured. The tenant contended that the failure to light the staircase was a breach of the contract of tenancy which imposed on the landlords the obligation to provide safe access to her flat. The alternative claim for negligence was dismissed on the facts and the case is only reported on the issue of the alleged breach of contract.

Croom-Johnson (R. Marven Everett with him) for the tenant.

Dare for the landlords.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., found as a fact that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the tenant when climbing the stairs, and continued: The question is whether, having regard to the obligations which the landlords have undertaken in letting these premises, they are liable to compensate the tenant or whether there is some other duty on them outside any resulting from the relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties. So far as the room let to the tenant is concerned, there is no covenant, express or implied, on the part of the landlords to do any repairs, whether structural or otherwise. In FOA ON THE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, 7th ed., p. 132, para. 215, the learned author says this in regard to a building let in floors:

"In the case of the letting of floors or flats in a building, where the only access to them is by a staircase which is not part of the property demised, but the legal possession and control of which remain in the landlord, the rule is that as between the parties themselves, the tenant having a contractual right with his landlord to use the staircase, there is a corresponding obligation on the latter to use reasonable care in providing safe access to the premises . . ."

The authority cited for that proposition is Dunster v. Hollis (1). One of the tenant's difficulties here is that this is not a case of non-repair. The learned author goes on:

" . . . knowledge by the tenant of any defect which may give rise to injury affords in itself no answer to a claim by him, though it may be evidence of contributory negligence on his part that may disentitle him to recover."

There it is called a "contractual" right. With great respect to those learned judges who have examined this problem, I prefer to deal with it on the basis that this was an easement of necessity. The tenant is entitled as against the landlords to exclusive possession of these premises so long as she remains the tenant, pays the rent, and does not offend against the relevant provisions in the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. Accordingly, there is a way of necessity, which the landlords must provide for her to enable her to get to the premises.

Broadly speaking, a person who has a right of way must take it as he finds it, and, if he wants any repairs done to it, he must do them himself. That branch of the law falls into line with the general contractual view, which is that the landlord is not liable to repair premises which he has let, though it may be a nice question as to how far he is responsible for repairing the way of necessity. I propose to direct myself, following the passage in FOA ON THE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, already quoted, by the proposition that there is an obligation on the landlords to use reasonable care in providing safe access to the premises. It is admitted here that the staircase and the stairs were in good order.

Since 1923 the decision of the Court of Appeal in Miller v. Hancock (2) has been overruled, but the general statements contained in the judgments with regard to the law of landlord and tenant are still good and proper statements of the law. BOWEN, L.J., said ([1893] 2 Q.B. 181):

"It appears to me obvious, when one considers what a flat of this kind is, and the only way in which it can be enjoyed, that the parties to the demise of it must have intended by necessary implication, as a basis without which the whole transaction would be futile, that the landlord should maintain the staircase, which is essential to the enjoyment of the premises demised, and should keep it reasonably safe for the use of the tenants . . ."

A and he went on to refer to the position of persons necessarily coming to the place, which in the light of later authorities is no longer good law. He continued (ibid.):

B "It seems to me that it would render the whole transaction inefficacious and absurd if an implied undertaking were not assumed on the part of the landlord to maintain the staircase so far as might be necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of the demised premises."

I think that statement is probably a little too wide. BOWEN, L.J., goes on:

C "If that be so, the case is brought within the dictum of LORD MANSFIELD in Taylor v. Whitehead (3), to the effect that by the common law he who has the use of a thing ought to repair it, but the grantor may bind himself."

As he has not done so in this case, it rests on the basis of an implied obligation by the landlords.

D In Huggett v. Miers (4), in which Miller v. Hancock (2) was discussed, the Court of Appeal dealt with the lighting of a staircase in a place where the tenants were using part of the premises let to them as offices. The question involved there was whether or not, in an action brought by the tenant against the landlord in respect of injuries arising from a fall, there was a duty on the landlord to light the premises. There was no express obligation, and it was held that there was no implied obligation, the implication being sought to be supported by a provision in the tenancy agreement that each tenant should maintain a light on the staircase outside the door of his premises. It is plain from the judgment of the Court of Appeal that in certain circumstances there might be an implied obligation. SIR GORELL BARNES, P., said ([1908] 2 K.B. 283):

F "It is clear that, as a general rule, the grant of an easement imposes no obligation on the owner of the servient tenement to do anything in the nature of repair."

Then he cited with approval the passage from Miller v. Hancock (2) and continued (ibid.):

G "It was, however, pointed out in Miller v. Hancock (2) that there may be cases in which, either by express agreement or by necessary implication, the landlord of premises, let as these were, contracts with the tenants to do any repairs which may be necessary to the staircase, or possibly to do something more than repairs . . ."

"... possibly to do something more than repairs." That, I think, might cover the case of lighting these stairs.

H This branch of this case was presented to me by counsel for the tenant boldly on the view that there was a necessary implication. In Dobson v. Horsley (5) all these matters were considered in the Court of Appeal, and BUCKLEY, L.J., said ([1915] 1 K.B. 640):

"What seems to flow from these cases as a matter of principle is this: that the lessor, the defendant, is liable in any case in which, by way of implied grant, he enters into an implied obligation to provide something and fails to provide it. But where that is not the case and where the lessor simply offers to the tenant the right to use a particular sort of approach and the tenant accepts it, the tenant must accept the approach such as it is—say a plank with no handrail across a stream or steps protected only by a coping eight inches high. The tenant using it is not trapped in any way; he knows perfectly well that there is no handrail or railing, and he accepts the risk of using the access in the form in which it is provided.”

I shall have to examine whether an access was provided, and whether the tenant is entitled to insist as a matter of right—not as a matter of convenience—on this staircase being lighted at times other than those when the landlords without any express obligation lighted it. A

The question when a term of this sort is to be implied in a contract is extremely difficult. In two cases recently the King's Bench Division have considered the question of an implication where the duties of rent tribunals under the recent legislation were involved—R. v. Paddington & St. Marylebone Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Bedrock Investments, Ltd. (6) and R. v. Croydon Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Chalkley (7). The questions involved were whether an obligation on the landlord was to be implied from all the circumstances to provide certain amenities—whether they were things which the landlord, as a matter of good business, would continue to provide, or things which he had undertaken to provide and maintain. The decisions are, perhaps, not of great assistance here, but in his judgment in R. v. Paddington & St. Marylebone Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Bedrock Investments, Ltd. (6), LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 17): B C

“There is no ground, in my opinion, for implying any covenant, and none ought ever to be implied unless there is such a necessary implication that the court can have no doubt what covenant or undertaking they ought to write into the agreement.” D

That passage was approved by the Divisional Court in R. v. Croydon Rent Tribunal, Ex p. Chalkley (7).

[HIS LORDSHIP found as a fact that before the war the premises were usually kept with the staircase lighted very late at night; that during the war the lighting consisted of a “pin-point” on each floor outside the door of the lift; that lighting was restored in 1947 when the landlords thought they were returning to pre-war lighting; that in 1948, as a result of requests to save electric current, the landlords, without giving notice to the tenants, installed a system under which the staircase lighting was automatically cut off at certain periods; and that this control system was erratic in its working so that it was never possible to know when the lights would be found on or off, but they were frequently on until twelve midnight. He continued:] E F

That presents me with the problem of examining whether I can spell out of those facts an implied covenant by the landlords to maintain a reasonable period of lighting. They did maintain it to some time every evening, but not at all hours of the night. It is suggested in FOA ON THE LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT that, where a landlord has for a long time done repairs to premises and maintained them in a particular condition, that is evidence on which, as I understood it, the court ought to imply a covenant by the landlord to do repairs or that the original performance of the repairs was the result of a legal obligation on the landlord to do them. The learned author cites for that proposition Broggi v. Robins (8), but he doubts the accuracy of the principle and I do not think the case decides anything of the sort. There was evidence in that case that the landlord had done the repairs, but the case did not proceed on that basis. There was evidence (which the trial judge accepted) of an express undertaking by the landlord's agent at the time of the letting that the premises should be kept in repair, and it was on that basis that the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that there had been a failure by the landlord to discharge his contractual obligation. That being so, I do not feel G H myself constrained to hold that, because the landlords before and after the war did light this staircase in the hours of darkness, therefore I must imply an obligation on their part to do it. If the implication is to be raised at all, it must be by virtue of something other than that particular circumstance.

I referred earlier to Dunster v. Hollis (1) which purported to deal with Dobson v. Horsley (5). There seems to have been some doubt in the minds of some of the judges who have dealt with this sort of matter (not always as between landlord and tenant, but as between the landlord and parties resorting to the let premises who were either invitees or supposititious licensees of the landlord), whether Dunster v. Hollis (1) was really based on Miller v. Hancock (2). With great respect I do not think it was. The lessor had let to a tenant rooms in a building, and, as here, had retained control of a common staircase and a flight of steps. It was held that the lessor's obligation was not an absolute obligation to the tenant to keep the steps reasonably safe. Nor was it merely to avoid exposing the tenant to a concealed danger or trap, but it was to take reasonable care to keep the steps reasonably safe, and, unless the tenant had been guilty of contributory negligence, the visibility of the danger was no defence to an action by the tenant against the lessor for damage caused by the steps not being reasonably safe. That was an entirely different case from the present one. It related to steps which had fallen out of repair, and LUSH, J., came to the conclusion that the defendant landlord had ample opportunity to ascertain that the steps needed repair and that negligence had been proved.

My difficulty in the present case, which is not a case of repair in that sense, is to decide what sort of obligation I am to imply. I am asked to imply an obligation to light the staircase at reasonable hours. Who is to be the judge of that? As I see it, the obligation must be something which is certain. It might vary from tenant to tenant. The landlord letting a block of flats would have to see whether his obligation as regards each individual was to leave lights on all night, or until four o'clock, twelve o'clock, or ten o'clock. I see the greatest difficulty in implying any such obligation. The tenant has not satisfied me that, if the obligation extends to ensuring reasonable safety, there was anything unreasonable in what the landlords did, or that an obligation to keep a means of approach reasonably safe or in good repair extends to the hour at which the lighting ought to be kept on. On that branch of the case, therefore, I think the tenant fails.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the evidence did not substantiate the allegation of negligence, and he continued:] Accordingly I reject that contention also. The result is that this action fails, and there must be judgment for the landlords with costs.

Judgment for the landlords with costs.

ARIS-BAINBRIDGE v. TURNER MANUFACTURING CO., LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (McNair, J.), October 12, 13, 30, November 3, 17, 1950.]

"Turnover"—Turnover of "company's annual business"—Sums to be included. A ACTION for damages for wrongful dismissal and for commission.

Under a contract of service, dated Aug. 30, 1945, the plaintiff was employed as a sales manager by the defendant company who were engaged on munition production for the Ministry of Supply and the Ministry of Aircraft Production. The contract provided that the plaintiff should be paid, inter alia, "a commission of one-tenth of one per cent. on turnover up to £500,000 and a commission of one-twentieth of one per cent. on turnover above £500,000 of the company's annual business to commence with the next financial year . . ." At that time the defendant company had still running certain government contracts which were subject to a break clause, under which the government department concerned could either (i) call for the completion of the articles, or part of the articles, manufactured, which would then be paid for at fair and reasonable prices, or (ii) call for reduction of manufacture and concentration on the completion of parts already partly manufactured and for handing over of all unused material at fair and reasonable prices. Provision was also made that in cases of hardship a reasonable allowance was to be paid to the defendant company. Notices under the break clause had been given to the defendant company before the commencement of the plaintiff's employment, and in the first two years of that employment the defendant company received sums representing lump sum settlements for articles taken over and payment of claims for hardship made under the break clause. The plaintiff claimed that the turnover on which his commission was based should include the sums paid in respect of the settlements under the break clause. B

R. v. PARRY AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Parker, JJ.), November 27, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Probation order—Power of court also to fine—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 3 (1), s. 13.

Where a court makes a probation order under s. 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, it has no power at the same time to impose a fine under s. 13.

[FOR THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE ACT, 1948, s. 3 and s. 13, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Continuation Vol. 1948, pp. 154, 166, and 168, respectively.]

APPEAL against sentence.

The appellants, John Henry Parry, George Julian Parry, and Dennis Spriggs, were convicted at Leicester City Sessions of breaking and entering and larceny and each was put on probation for two years and ordered to pay a fine of £25. The ground of the appeal was that the court had no power to make a probation order under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 3 (1), and at the same time to impose a fine under s. 13.

G. H. Dixon for the appellants.

Stimson for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court.

D

The question arising in these cases, which are brought before us on a certificate by the recorder of Leicester, is whether, when making a probation order, the court can at the same time impose a fine. It is a point of some importance, because some courts of quarter sessions have been in doubt about it. Section 3 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, provides:

E

"Where a court by or before which a person is convicted of an offence (not being an offence the sentence for which is fixed by law) is of opinion that having regard to the circumstances, including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it is expedient to do so, the court may, instead of sentencing him, make a probation order, that is to say, an order requiring him to be under the supervision of a probation officer for a period to be specified in the order of not less than one year nor more than three years."

It is then provided by s. 3 (3):

" . . . Provided that (without prejudice to the power of the court to make an order under s. 11 (2) of this Act) the payment of sums by way of damages for injury or compensation for loss shall not be included among the requirements of a probation order."

G

Section 3 (5) provides:

H

"Before making a probation order, the court shall explain to the offender in ordinary language the effect of the order (including any additional requirements proposed to be inserted therein under sub-s. (3) or sub-s. (4) of this section or under the next following section) and that if he fails to comply therewith or commits another offence he will be liable to be sentenced for the original offence . . ."

In other words, if a probation order is made and its terms are broken, the probationer can be brought back and sentenced by the court which has convicted him of the offence of which he had previously been convicted. It happens not infrequently that while a person is on probation he commits another offence. When he does so it is right, to emphasize that probation is not a formality, that he should be brought back and sentenced for the offence for which he has been put on probation.

Section 11 (2) provides:

"A court, on making a probation order or an order for conditional discharge or on discharging an offender absolutely under this Part of this Act, may, without prejudice to its power of awarding costs against him, order the offender to pay such damages for injury or compensation for loss as the court thinks reasonable . . ."

Provision is made that the damages and compensation are not to exceed £100, and then, by sub-s. (3):

"An order for the payment of damages or compensation as aforesaid may be enforced in like manner as an order for the payment of costs by the offender . . ."

that is to say, as a civil debt and not in any way as the result of an offence carrying the sanction of imprisonment or other punishment administered corporeally. Damages or compensation are in no sense a fine. A fine can always be enforced by imprisonment, but damages or compensation cannot.

The matter which causes doubt is that s. 13 of the Act provides:

"Any court before which an offender is convicted on indictment of felony (not being a felony the sentence for which is fixed by law) shall have power to fine the offender in lieu of or in addition to dealing with him in any other manner in which the court has power to deal with him."

The history of that section and the reason for importing it into the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, is well known. There were certain felonies, principally those under the Larceny Act, 1916, in which a court of summary jurisdiction had power to fine. That was because it was considered desirable in the case of petty thefts that a court should be able to fine the offender and not send him to prison, but in cases which came before a court of assize or quarter sessions on indictment there was no power to fine until this Act of 1948, except in the case of manslaughter. The reason for that was that the offence of manslaughter varies enormously in seriousness according to the circumstances in which it is committed. Over and over again judges have had to deal at assizes with an offence which technically was a felony, where they would have been glad to have imposed a fine had there been power to do so. The court was often left in the position that it had either to send a person of hitherto good character to prison for a comparatively small offence or else bind him over, which was to inflict no punishment. That is the reason why Parliament by the Act of 1948 gave to courts trying cases on indictment the same powers as courts of summary jurisdiction formerly had in certain cases and now have in all cases of felony, i.e., the power of imposing a fine instead of sending to prison.

In my view, it is impossible to read s. 13 as applying to the sections which precede it and deal with probation because they would be contradictory, and it is not necessary for the true construction of s. 13 to give it the contradictory effect of the earlier sections. Under those sections it is clear that the court has power to order the payment of sums of money, not by way of punishment, but by way of compensation. I emphasize "not by way of punishment" because, if it were by way of punishment, there would be provision for inflicting a sentence of imprisonment in default.

In the opinion of the court, it is plain, when the fasciculus of sections dealing with probation is considered, that the words in s. 13 "or in addition to dealing with him in any other manner in which the court has power to deal with him" cannot apply where a probation order is made. If the court makes a probation order, it has no power to fine. If it decides to fine, it cannot make a probation order. Consequently, this sentence cannot stand. As this court has power in any case to pass a sentence which, in their opinion, ought to have been passed in substitution for a sentence which is defective or illegal, we shall set aside the probation order and leave the fine standing, with a penalty of three months in default of payment.

Sentence varied.

MacMaster for the tenant in tail in remainder.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiffs in this action are the present trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, of the settlement created by the codicil to the will of the seventh Duke of Northumberland, who died on May 14, 1918. The will was dated Apr. 4, 1916, and the codicil Apr. 7, 1916, and such will and codicil were proved on June 18, 1918, by the eighth Duke of Northumberland. The eighth duke died on Aug. 23, 1930, and on his death his widow, who is the first defendant, became, and she still is, the tenant for life in possession under the said settlement. The second defendant, the tenth Duke of Northumberland, is tenant for life in remainder expectant on the death of the first defendant. His daughter, Lady Caroline Mary Percy, the third defendant, is tenant in tail in remainder expectant on the termination of the said two preceding estates for life.

The property which is the subject of the said settlement includes the Albury estate in the county of Surrey. It comprises about 3,500 acres and is for the most part agricultural land. The first defendant, the tenant for life, has informed the plaintiffs that considerable sums have been expended by her in repairs to and in and about the maintenance of the Albury estate in and since 1945 and that such sums have exceeded the net rents received from the estate during that period. Moreover, it would appear that a high rate of expenditure on such repairs is likely to continue for many years to come. The following figures are indicated as representing the amounts spent by the tenant for life on repairs to farms, farm cottages and market garden cottages, comprised in the estate: in 1945, £500; in 1946, £771; in 1947, £1,191; and in 1948, £3,104.

The following figures are stated to represent the amount spent by the tenant for life on repairs to woodmen's cottages, cottages occupied by estate building department's workmen, and gamekeepers' cottages: in 1945, £178; in 1946, £270; in 1947, £78; and in 1948, £499. The tenant for life is desirous of having recouped to her out of capital a part of the cost of repairs executed during the years in question and of the cost of repairs to be executed in the future. The plaintiffs desire to have their powers and obligations in this respect elucidated. Capital moneys of the settlement amount to some £250,000.

The questions raised involve a consideration of a number of interlocking sections of various Acts of Parliament. A separate question—a question of construction—arises under the codicil, the answer to which might to some extent render unnecessary any detailed consideration of the statutory provisions. I will take that question first. The relevant clauses of the codicil are as follows:

"39. As regards any sale enfranchisement exchange reconveyance surrender partition mortgage charge grant reservation lease (for any term or purpose) or other disposition covenant (restrictive or otherwise) or contract or any purchase or other acquisition of property real or personal or investment or application of capital money or as regards any dealing or arrangement with respect to any part of the premises hereby settled or any easement right or privilege over or in respect of the same or of any share therein or any mines minerals or surface which is not hereby or by the Settled Lands Acts otherwise authorised such disposition covenant contract acquisition investment application dealing or arrangement may be made or given effect to at any time and from time to time by the tenant for life either with the consent of the trustees or trustee in writing or under an order of the court. 40. In giving such consent as aforesaid the trustees or trustee shall consider whether or not the proposed disposition covenant contract acquisition investment application dealing or arrangement will be for the benefit of the premises hereby settled or of the tenant for life or his successors in title but shall not be liable to account in respect of any such consent given in good faith which shall be binding on all persons then or thereafter interested hereunder and the court may make the order if in its opinion an Act of Parliament might be obtained authorising the transaction were it one which could have been effected without obtaining an Act of Parliament if the premises had not been settled."

It might well be suggested that cl. 39 is so wide and so vague as to be meaningless and ineffective. Literally, it would appear to give unlimited power to the tenant for life and the trustees to do exactly as they please with regard to (inter alia) the application of capital money, and to enable the trustees, if they thought fit, to hand over such capital money to the tenant for life unconditionally as being an application plainly for her benefit. On the whole, I do not think that the clauses can be held to be wholly inoperative, and, on the other hand, I think that the trustees must, notwithstanding the disjunctive form of the words "for the benefit of the premises hereby settled or of the tenant for life or of his successors in title," confine their consents to cases in which, on a broad view, they consider the matter beneficial to all parties and conducive to the general interest of the persons presently or prospectively entitled under the settlement.

I am asked specifically whether the provisions of those clauses could be utilised in relation to the desired recoupment if and so far as the matters in respect of which recoupment is desired are not strictly within the relevant statutory provisions, and, in my judgment, this question may be answered in the affirmative, with this qualification, that is to say, if the trustees under the advice of independent surveyors and having regard to every relevant consideration consider it to be the right thing to do. Among such relevant considerations, I would suggest: (a) the desirability or otherwise of retaining the estate unsold, (b) the pecuniary resources of the parties, and (c) their personal relationships, amicable or otherwise. I think, however, that the trustees should be advised to exercise those powers with the greatest caution and only to exercise them in cases in which they are quite clear that what is proposed is fair and right and reasonable in the circumstances.

[HIS LORDSHIP indicated the order which he would make in answer to question (v) of the summons and continued:] Turning to the relevant statutory provisions, I observe, first, that capital money is applicable under s. 73 (1) (iv) of the Settled Land Act, 1925:

"In payment as for an improvement authorised by this Act of any money expended and costs incurred by a landlord under or in pursuance of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 . . . in or about the execution of any improvement comprised in Part I or Part II of sched. I to that Act."

The first question is as to the meaning of the word "landlord" in the subsection. Is it necessary that there should be a contract of tenancy of any kind? The answer to that question seems to me to be that where the word is used in close conjunction with a reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, it bears the meaning which is assigned to it in that Act, in s. 57 of which it is defined as "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any land . . ." In WOLSTENHOLME AND CHERRY, 12th ed., p. 1098, there is a note to the sub-section suggesting that the point is doubtful. I must, therefore, resolve it, and I do so in the sense indicated. I may observe that a similar definition is contained in the subsequent Act: see s. 94 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which I will call the Act of 1948.

A It is to be noticed that the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 75 (2), provides that capital money shall be invested or applied according to the direction of the tenant for life, and, in default thereof, according to the discretion of the trustees, and, in my judgment, that section is applicable here. That does not mean that the trustees can accept the direction of the tenant for life blindly or be absolved from the duty of ascertaining that the mode of application is within the provisions of the Act, a matter in which, in any case of doubt, they must have recourse to the professional advice of lawyers or surveyors.

B Section 96 (1) of the Act of 1948 provides, among other things, that references to Part I and Part II of sched. I to the Act of 1923 shall be construed as references to sched. III to the Act of 1948 and to Part II of that schedule respectively. Paragraph 23 of Part II of the last-mentioned schedule is in the following terms:

C “Repairs to fixed equipment, being equipment reasonably required for the proper farming of the holding, other than repairs which the tenant is under an obligation to carry out,” and by s. 94 of the Act of 1948 “fixed equipment” is defined to include “any building or structure affixed to land and any works on, in, over or under land . . .” and

D “ . . . anything grown on land for a purpose other than use after severance from the land, consumption of the thing grown or of produce thereof, or amenity . . .”

The Act of 1948 came into force on July 30, 1948. It was a consolidating Act, and it consolidated not only the Act of 1923, but also Part III of the Agriculture Act, 1947, which (by virtue of the Agriculture Act, 1947 (Commencement) E (No. 1) Order, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 342)) came into force on Mar. 1, 1948. Section 22 (4) of and sched. III to the last-mentioned Act correspond with s. 96 (1) of and sched. III to the Act of 1948 respectively. By s. 42 (1) of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and s. 81 (1) of the Act of 1948, it is provided that where, under powers conferred by the Settled Land Act, 1925, capital money is applied in or about the execution of any improvement specified in sched. III to such F respective Acts, no provision shall be made for requiring the money or any part thereof to be replaced out of income, and, accordingly, any such improvement shall be deemed to be an improvement authorised by Part I of sched. III to the Settled Land Act, 1925. This is, in my judgment, a very inappropriate and inconvenient use of what may be called “referential legislation”. The Settled Land Act, 1925, deals with settled land and the mutual rights and G obligations of persons possessing particular estates and interests in such land. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, Part III of the Agriculture Act, 1947, and the Act of 1948, all relate to agricultural holdings as defined in s. 1 of the Act of 1948, and particularly the mutual rights and obligations of landlords and tenants, and it would have been much easier to follow the meaning and purpose of the legislature if these very different subject-matters had been kept H separate and distinct.

However, applying as best I can the law as it seems to me to emerge from this welter of confused and confusing enactment, I will answer the question raised by the summons as follows. Under paras. (i), (ii), and (iii) of the summons, I will declare that under the enactments mentioned in para. (i) the plaintiffs, as trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, of the settlement constituted by the codicil are entitled to apply capital moneys of the said settlement in payment (as for an improvement authorised by the Settled Land Act, 1925) of any money expended or to be expended and costs incurred or to be incurred by the tenant for life under the said settlement in or about the execution on or after Jan. 1, 1945, on such repairs as are specified in para. 23 of sched. III to the Act of 1948 in relation to agricultural land, whether or not the same be comprised in a contract of tenancy and whether or not within the definition of "agricultural land" in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1948.

I interpose the comment that the last-mentioned definition cannot, in my judgment, be applicable in the present connection. It reads thus:

"In this Act the expression 'agricultural holding' means the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in a contract of tenancy, not being a contract under which the said land is let to the tenant during his continuance in any office, appointment or employment held under the landlord."

It is further to be observed that I have chosen Jan. 1, 1945, first because the evidence does not deal with any earlier period, and, secondly, because recoupment of expenditure made more than six years ago would seem to be inconsistent with the principles laid down in Re Borough Court Estate (1).

Under para. iv of the summons, I will declare that the trustees are bound to comply with the directions of the tenant for life on being satisfied that the application of the capital money was or will be within the relevant provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and consistent with this judgment. Under para. v, I will make declarations in terms which I have already mentioned. Under para. vi, I will make a representation order under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 9. I will direct the costs of all parties of this application to be taxed as between solicitor and client and raised and paid out of the capital money.

Order accordingly.

AMERICAN ECONOMIC LAUNDRY, LTD. v. LITTLE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Birkett, L.JJ.), November 22, 23, 1950.]

Rent Restriction—Death of tenant—"Member of tenant's family"—Daughter residing in house at time of statutory tenant's death—Unconditional order for possession made against tenant before death, but suspended—Death of statutory tenant before date for possession—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (g).

On Sept. 20, 1949, an unconditional order for possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied was made against a statutory tenant. Execution of the order was suspended under the power contained in s. 5 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, until Dec. 20, 1949, and thereafter, on an application by the tenant, until Jan. 20, 1950. The landlords did not proceed to eject the tenant immediately on the termination of the extended time on Jan. 20, and on Mar. 3, on a further application by the tenant, the time was extended to Apr. 3, 1950. On Mar. 8, 1950, the tenant died, and his daughter, the defendant, who had been residing with him for not less than six months immediately before his death, remained in possession, claiming that she was entitled to do so as a member of the tenant's family within s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920.

HELD: under s. 12 (1) (g) the defendant could succeed only to the limited interest in the tenancy which had been possessed by her father; as an order for possession against him had been made to take effect on Apr. 3, 1950, there was no tenancy to which she could succeed; and, therefore, the landlords were entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE LEON, made at Clerkenwell County Court on July 17, 1950, whereby he refused to grant an order for possession on the ground that the defendant, the daughter of the deceased statutory tenant, was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

N. MacDermot for the landlords.

The defendant appeared in person.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the landlords, the American Economic Laundry, Ltd., from a decision of His Honour JUDGE LEON which concerns the Rent Restrictions Acts. The defendant, Miss Little, is the daughter of the deceased tenant and she claims under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 13, and the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1935, s. 1, the relevant words of which provide:

"... the expression 'tenant' includes the widow of a tenant ... who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant ... leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

The defendant claims that those last words apply to her case. She was residing with her father and he was, she submits, a tenant within the meaning of that provision.

While the defendant's father was alive the landlords took proceedings against him and obtained a final order for possession on Sept. 20, 1949, but under the powers given by s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920, as substituted by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1933, s. 4, execution was suspended until Dec. 20, 1949. On Dec. 15, 1949, the defendant's father applied, as he was entitled to do under s. 5 (2), for an extension of the suspension of the order and that was granted until Jan. 20, 1950. From Jan. 20, 1950, until Mar. 3, the landlords, undoubtedly, could have executed the order, though they did not do so. On Mar. 3, the defendant's father being seriously ill, application was made on his behalf for an extension to Apr. 3, 1950. On Mar. 8 the defendant's father died. The defendant has remained in possession. The landlords took out a summons for possession and the defendant claimed that she was entitled to remain in possession by reason of the rights given in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 to the relatives of a deceased tenant. The point which now arises is whether a tenant against whom a final order has been made is a "tenant" within s. 12 (1) (g)? That definition, like all the definitions in the Act, is to be read strictly except where the context otherwise requires.

The learned judge decided that the defendant was within the words "member of the tenant's family" and could claim to stay on in possession. The learned judge said, and I agree with him, that the point is not free from difficulty. Having stated the facts, he referred, first, to Brown v. Draper (1), and cited the following passage of LORD GREENE, M.R. ([1944] 1 All E.R. 248):

"... the only ways in which he [the tenant] can be deprived of the protection of the Acts are (a) by giving up possession, in which case no order for recovery of possession against him is required; or (b) by having an order for recovery of possession made against him . . ."

Those words, read literally, might be taken to indicate that the order for possession in itself deprived him of the protection of the Act. On the other hand, the learned county court judge referred to a statement of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Keeves v. Dean, Nunn v. Pellegrini (2), where the learned lord justice said ([1924] 1 K.B. 694):

"I take it that he [the tenant] has a right as against all the world to remain in possession until he is turned out by an order of the court . . ."

The difference between the literal meaning of those statements of the law becomes apparent in the present case. I agree with the learned judge in that I do not think LORD GREENE, M.R., had in mind the point which we have to consider here, viz.: What is the position of a statutory tenant (I am not begging the question by using the word "tenant," but it is useful to use it) between the time when the order for possession is made and the time when it falls to be executed having regard to a suspension under s. 5 (2)? I do not think that that point was in the mind of either the Master of the Rolls or of SCRUTTON, L.J., but it is right to say that the Master of the Rolls, in using the words he did, expressed something with which I respectfully agree, and which seems plain, namely, that an absolute order for possession made against a tenant fundamentally alters the position. The learned judge, having regard to those two statements which on the face of them point to different moments in a case where the order is not immediately executed, proceeded to consider the matter broadly on these lines. He posed to himself the question whether Mr. Little, after the order had been made and while it was suspended, was a statutory tenant protected by the Acts. He pointed out that there are, I think admittedly, many respects in which he was, at any rate, in the same position as a statutory tenant. The landlords, for instance, could not raise his rent. As was said in one case, he might be regarded as being there by licence of the court, but, no doubt, there are certain respects in which his position, quoad the person to whom he is paying mesne profits, is, during the interval, very much the same as it was before. I agree with what was said by JENKINS, L.J., in the course of the argument, that the position of someone against whom an order for possession has been made and suspended at common law or under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 is sui generis. The problem which we have to solve is not assisted by considering in what respect his position is the same quoad the landlords as it was before the order was made. Obviously it is fundamentally different in the respect, that, whereas before he was entitled to the protection of the Acts until successful proceedings were taken, he is now in the position of proceedings having been taken and an order for possession having been made. All that he has is a right to apply for a postponement under s. 5 (2).

In my opinion, a tenant in that position, with an absolute order made against him, notwithstanding that it may be suspended, is not a tenant within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. That, I think, is in accordance with a common-sense application of the section. It would be an illogical result if that section gave protection to a widow which the court had expressly taken away from the husband whose tenancy she relies on, that tenancy having been brought to a suspended end by the order for possession. I am reinforced in that view by a case which deals with an analogous, though not identical, question, viz., Bolsover Colliery Co., Ltd. v. Abbott (3). That was also concerned with s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. The premises in question had been originally let to a tenant in the employment of the landlords who sought possession under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (g), which provides that an order for possession can be made without proof of suitable alternative accommodation where

“the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord for occupation as a residence for some person engaged in his wholtime employment . . . and . . . (i) the tenant was in the employment of the landlord or a former landlord, and the dwelling-house was let to him in consequence of that employment and he has ceased to be in that employment . . .”

While, therefore, the original tenant was alive, if he had ceased to be in the employment of the landlords, the other conditions being satisfied, the landlords would have had the right to invoke the provisions of the schedule and satisfy the county court judge that it would be reasonable to make an order for possession. The tenant had become a statutory tenant, and he continued in his employment until his death, when his son, who had been residing with him, claimed to continue in possession under the definition in s. 12 (1) (g). In 1945 the landlords required the house for the occupation of a person in their whole-time employment. The defendant declined to give up possession and the landlords' claim to recover possession was dismissed by the county court. The headnote illustrates the similarity between that case and the present one:

“Held, that the father's tenancy was subject to defeasance by the plaintiffs on his ceasing to be in their employment by virtue of the provisions of para. (g) (i) of the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, that when the defendant succeeded to that tenancy, it remained subject to the same defeasance and therefore the plaintiffs having established that they required the house for occupation by a person in their whole-time employment, were entitled to an order for possession.”

The case raised questions of construction in deciding whether the word “tenant” in para. (g) of sched. I could be regarded as including a deceased tenant's widow or other relative claiming protection. This court held that he could not, and at the conclusion of his judgment SCOTT, L.J., used these words ([1946] K.B. 12):

“The right of the landlord and the liability of the tenant are co-extensive in that respect, and a tenancy carried on by the provisions of the Act as to the succession of a widow or other relation is the same tenancy with its advantages and disadvantages unaltered. I, therefore, thinks that the appeal should be allowed.”

That is of importance, although I do not think it is necessarily conclusive in the present case. It illustrates the principle which has led me to the conclusion that in the circumstances of this case the defendant had no rights which she could exercise under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920.

Counsel for the landlords referred to the fact that under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 orders for possession may take either of two forms. There may be, as here, an absolute order the execution of which is suspended, or there may be a conditional order, that is to say, the order for possession does not become operative so long as certain conditions are fulfilled—it may be payment of rent or abatement of a nuisance. The difference between those two kinds of orders is illustrated by the concluding words of s. 5 (2), where it is said in reference to an order made subject to conditions:

" . . . if such conditions are complied with, the court may, if it thinks fit, discharge . . . any such order . . . "

That cannot be done when an absolute order has been made. I am not deciding what the position would be in a case of this kind where a conditional order had been made against the deceased. It may be that the result would be the same; it may be that it would be different. There seems to me, at any rate, scope for argument, which would require serious consideration, that a different result would be arrived at, and, therefore, it is better to leave it to be decided if and when it arises. For those reasons I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The expression "statutory tenancy," as I understand it, is a compendious expression to describe the right of a tenant of protected premises to remain in possession of those premises, notwithstanding the determination of his contractual interest, until such time as he either voluntarily gives up possession or the court, on cause shown, makes an order against him to deliver up possession. In the latter alternative there will in most, if not all, cases be a period of time between the date when the order for possession is made and the date set by the court under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1920 as the date on which the order is to be complied with.

In the present case Mr. Little died after the date of the order for recovery of possession against him, but before the expiration of the last of a series of extensions which had been made by way of postponement of the date on which the order was to be complied with. What was his position? It is said that, notwithstanding the order for possession, he was still a statutory tenant. To say that seems to me really to beg the question. It may well be that he could be described as a statutory tenant, but that description would not itself accurately define his precise position because he was a statutory tenant against whom had been made a final order, under which possession was to be delivered up on a fixed date. During the period intervening between the date of such an order and the date fixed for delivery of possession the statutory tenant has obviously certain rights and certain obligations. For instance, during that period he would have to pay the equivalent of the rent. That is not to say, however, that he is still a statutory tenant for all purposes, so as to be in the same position as if the order had never been made. He has nothing left but the limited interest granted to him by what may be described as the indulgence of the court pursuant to s. 5 (2). In effect, he has a period of grace.

That being the character of the statutory tenant's interest after the order for possession has been made, what effect, if any, can be given to the provisions of s. 12 (1) (g), under which, on the death of a statutory tenant, a member of the tenant's family residing on the premises becomes the statutory tenant? It was held by the learned judge that that provision still remained of full force and effect, that on the death of her father the defendant became the statutory tenant under a new statutory tenancy which was hers and nobody else's and would continue to be enjoyed by her in her own right until such time as some new ground for claiming possession arose and the landlords successfully applied for and obtained an order for possession. That would be a most surprising result, and, notwithstanding the reasons to the contrary stated by the learned judge, I agree with my Lord that on a consideration of the relevant provisions of the Act there is really no warrant for his conclusion. I agree that the right principle to be followed is the one stated in the Bolsover case (3), which shows that the member of the family who becomes a statutory tenant on the death of the original tenant—although in a sense claiming in his or her own right, i.e., not claiming under the statutory tenant in the same way as an assignee or legatee of a contractual tenancy may be said to claim under the grantor or testator—nevertheless becomes a statutory tenant under the same tenancy by virtue of which the original statutory tenant was in possession. Thus, in the present case, assuming in the defendant's favour that, notwithstanding the existence of the final order for possession, she could still become statutory tenant of the premises by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, it seems to me clear that the tenancy to which she would succeed could be no more than the limited interest remaining to run between the date of her father's death and the expiration of the date fixed for possession by the order. For these reasons, and those stated by my Lord, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

JAWORSKI v. INSTITUTION OF POLISH ENGINEERS IN GREAT BRITAIN, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), October 30, 31 November 1, 27, 1950.]

Income Tax—Deduction of tax—Agreement to pay remuneration without deduction of tax—Validity—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 23 (2).

D

Under a service agreement, evidenced in writing, an employee of an association was entitled to receive his monthly salary "without any deductions and taxes, which will be borne by the association." The employers deducted income tax from his salary in accordance with the provisions of the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, s. 1, under which all emoluments assessable to tax under sched. E to the Income Tax Act, 1918, are to be deducted by the person making the payment. On the ground that the deductions were contrary to the terms of his service agreement the employee brought an action to recover the amounts deducted.

HELD: on construction, the agreement was one to pay net remuneration at the stated figure together with such sum as was necessary to leave that figure available to the employee after the association had borne the taxes referable to him, and, accordingly, the agreement was valid.

F

Per curiam: "We find a difficulty in seeing how r. 23 (2) of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, can be applicable except in cases when the deduction is permissive" and not mandatory.

Semble: salaries or other remuneration for services are not "annual payments" within r. 23 (2).

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of FINNEMORE, J., dated May 5, 1950, and reported p. 51, ante, whereby he held that an agreement by the defendants to pay to the plaintiff a salary in full without allowing any deductions for income tax was void under r. 23 (2) of the All Schedules Rules under the Income Tax Act, 1918. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by SOMERVELL, L.J.

A. F. M. Berkeley for the plaintiff.

Sir Roland Burrows, K.C., and Stogdon for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27. SOMERVELL, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of FINNEMORE, J., who decided in favour of the defendants. The facts which are fully stated by the learned judge can be shortly summarised. In January, 1943, the plaintiff, a Polish subject, entered the service of the defendants. The defendants were at that time an official body under the Polish government in London, recognised by His Majesty's government. The agreement of service was made orally at an interview conducted in Polish on Jan. 4, 1943, and confirmed by a letter of Jan. 8, written by the plaintiff, of which we have a translation. It is agreed that the translation is an accurate record of what was agreed. It reads as follows:

"Dear Colleague, With reference to our conversation regarding proposed work in the office of the association I beg to inform you that I agree with the proposal made to me, namely: My remuneration will amount (during the initial period, which I treat as a trial period) to £20 net per month, payable in advance, later increased to £25 net per month, without any deductions and taxes, which will be borne by the association. I dare say that I do not deem the remuneration of £25 to be a final one and I hope that after finding out my usefulness by the association, my remuneration will not be lower than salaries of other employees at the association's office. Business hours were communicated to me as follows: From 9.30 to 13 and from 14.30 to 17 hours. Questions regarding holiday and notice of employment are based on the provisions relating to Polish civil servants. Trusting that my work will be useful for the benefit of the association."

At that time the employees of the defendants were treated as having immunity in respect of income tax. The amount of £20 as stated in the letter was later raised to £36. By May, 1946, the plaintiff, with other employees of the defendants, had become liable to British income tax. Nothing turns on the fact that the defendants have been incorporated under the Companies Act.

It was not disputed that the emoluments of the plaintiff fell within the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, which, with the regulations made thereunder, established the system known as "P.A.Y.E." Under s. 1 (1) of that Act it is provided that on the making of any payment of any emoluments covered by the Act, income tax shall, subject to, and in accordance with, regulations to be made, be deducted by the person making the payment. In the year in question the defendants proceeded to make the appropriate deductions on the basis that the plaintiff's emoluments were £36 a month. The plaintiff claims that, on the true construction of his agreement, he is entitled to emoluments which will, after the proper deduction has been made, leave a sum of £36. The claim is for tax sums deducted from £36 in the year 1946-47 which have regard to the allowances to which the plaintiff is entitled.

An intention that an employee or annuitant should get a certain sum irrespective of variations in income tax is common. Such an intention would seem to appear on the face of this document. The difficulties arise from certain provisions of the Income Tax Acts, and their application to words which on the face of them appear to show such an intention, but have been held not to effect it. The principle by which tax is deducted at the source is applicable to a number of payments. The most familiar examples are to be found in r. 19 and r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules in sched. I to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Leaving out words which do not matter, r. 19 provides:

"(1) Where any yearly interest of money, annuity, or any other annual payment . . . is payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax, no assessment shall be made upon the person entitled to such interest, annuity, or annual payment, but the whole of these profits or gains shall be assessed and charged with tax on the person liable to the interest, annuity, or annual payment . . . and the person liable to make such payment . . . shall be entitled, on making such payment, to deduct . . . a sum representing . . . the tax thereon . . ."

Rule 21 provides:

"(1) Upon payment of any interest of money, annuity, or other annual payment charged with tax under sched. D . . . not payable, or not wholly payable, out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon . . ."

It will be noticed in r. 19 the words are permissive and in r. 21 mandatory. Rule 23 provides as follows:

"(1) A person who refuses to allow a deduction of tax authorised by this Act to be made out of any payment, shall forfeit the sum of £50.

(2) Every agreement for payment of interest, rent, or other annual payment in full without allowing any such deduction shall be void."

There was argument below and before us whether r. 23 (2) applied to deductions "authorised" from salaries or emoluments for services. Are they or are they not "annual payments" within the rule? We find a difficulty in seeing how r. 23 (2) can be applicable except in cases when the deduction is permissive: see Blount v. Blount (1) ([1916] 1 K.B. 234). If this is right, no assistance can be got from North British Ry. Co. v. Scott (2), which dealt with a "right to deduct" given to railway companies. In the present area, if a man's wages are £5 and the employer agrees not to deduct income tax, the agreement would be a direct contravention of s. 1 of the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, and there would seem no need to resort to r. 23 (2).

It has been clearly established that, if appropriate words are used, a payer can so provide that the payee gets year by year a fixed sum. The payer covenants to pay a sum which after deduction of tax leaves the sum that it is desired should be available to the payee: Booth v. Booth (3). This is now familiar law, but the words used must point to a gross sum. In South American Stores (Gath & Chaves), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4), the appellant company issued debentures, the prospectus stating that the interest would be 5½ per cent. free of English income tax. ROWLATT, J., held that this could not be read as a covenant to pay such a sum as will leave the net sum at the disposal of the recipient. In Blount v. Blount (1) the covenant was to pay £62 10s. free of income tax. SCRUTTON, J., was unable to construe this as a covenant to pay a sum which after deduction of tax left £62 10s. and held that it was void under s. 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, the predecessor of r. 23 (2). In Whiteside v. Whiteside (5), SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., stated as beyond doubt that a promise to pay a sum of money free of income tax contravened the provisions of the income tax law. He clearly had not in mind contracts of service.

In the light of these and other decisions we approach the construction of the words used. The grammar is not, perhaps, quite clear. Is "without" to be understood before taxes, etc., or is it to be read as providing for "£20 and taxes"? However this may be, the words which, in our opinion, point to a gross sum are the later words "which will be borne by the association." We think one is entitled to have regard to the fact that this is not an instrument drawn by lawyers. We think it means—taking the £20 in the original agreement—"My remuneration is to be £20 plus whatever sum is necessary to leave that available to me after you have borne the taxes." As under the law the tax is suffered by deduction, it means such a sum as will after deduction leave £20.

At one time we thought it was being suggested by counsel for the plaintiff that the agreement meant such sum as after deduction at the standard rate left £20. We did not in the end understand him so to contend. This might have involved incorporating the principle of Re Pettit (6), which we would have been loath to do. An employer would be very unlikely to contract on the basis that his employees would have to repay to him sums which they had recovered from the Revenue because they were not liable to pay the standard rate on the whole or perhaps any part of their emoluments. The taxes are, in our opinion, the taxes referable to the plaintiff. An example of how this can be worked out is given in SIMON'S INCOME TAX, Vol. 3, pp. 39 and 40.

We have found it unnecessary to decide the question whether r. 23 (2) applies to salaries or remuneration for employment under sched. E. As, however, the point was argued before us, and the learned judge proceeded on the basis that it did apply, we will make some observations on it. That its predecessor applied to sched. E is expressly provided by s. 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and the Income Tax Act, 1918, was a consolidation Act. The words are:

" . . . and if any person shall refuse to allow any deduction authorised to be made by this Act out of any rent or other annual payment mentioned in r. 9 and r. 10 of sched. IV (A) or out of any annuity or annual payment mentioned in sched. (C) or sched. (E), or in the next preceding clause, save such annual interest as aforesaid, every such person shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds; and all contracts, covenants, and agreements made or entered into, or to be made or entered into, for payment of any interest, rent, or other annual payment aforesaid, in full, without allowing such deduction as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

Schedule E covers annuities and pensions as well as stipends and profits of public office. The former are annual payments, but the latter may not be. Under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 18 (1), other offices, employments and pensions previously assessable under sched. D were transferred to sched. E. So far as the latter are concerned, it has never, so far as we know, been suggested in any reported case that they were annual payments within the rules applicable to sched. D; it would be, at any rate, an unexpected result if they became annual payments by the transfer. Assuming that they do, for r. 23 (2) to be applicable, it would have to be shown that the deduction was authorised. If we are right in thinking that there is no room for r. 23 (2) where the deduction is mandatory, the only permissive deduction under sched. E, as the matter stood before the P.A.Y.E. scheme was in respect of railway companies. Under r. 7 the railway company was assessed in respect of their employees, and it was provided that they might deduct the tax from the emoluments. This was the provision which came before the House of Lords in North British Ry. Co. v. Scott (2). It was not necessary for the decision to decide whether r. 23 (2) applied. The fact that there was a reference to the company's contractual liability not to deduct and no one suggested that such a contractual liability was void under r. 23 (2) supports the view that profits of employment under sched. E are not annual payments within the rule. Reliance was placed on references in s. 26 (1) of the Finance Act, 1941, and para. 24 of the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1944 (S.R. & O., 1944, No. 251), as amended. For reasons which it is unnecessary to elaborate we doubt if much assistance can be got from either. They are certainly not purporting to render valid anything previously invalid. Their wording, though it would not conclude the issue if it ever arises, is, we think, more consistent with the view that r. 23 (2) has no application in this area than the other view.

The learned judge came, as we have said, to a different conclusion on the construction of this agreement. He prefaced his consideration by saying that the agreement could not be construed as an agreement for a gross sum unless this was done in quite plain terms. We are not sure that one should need plainer words for one construction rather than the other. We would have thought it was the other way. The parties clearly intended the plaintiff to get more than £20 subject, by deduction or otherwise, to the full tax. One must not, of course, re-write the contract, but, if two constructions are possible, we would favour one which gives effect to the intention of the parties. The learned judge went on to hold that r. 23 (2) was applicable. We have given our reasons for thinking that this does not arise, but, as the learned judge decided it was applicable, we thought it right to express our doubts on this point. For these reasons we think this appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Re SANDBACH (deceased).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), October 12, November 23, 1950.]

Settled Land—Improvement rentcharge—“Redemption”—Tithe annuity—“Discharge”—Payment by tenant for life of periodical instalments under rentcharge, representing capital and interest, and of annuities—Right to recoupment, in respect of such part of payments as represented capital, out of capital moneys subject to settlement—Settled Land Act, 1925 (c. 18), s. 73 (1) (xiii), (xvi).

Loans made by the Lands Improvement Co. in respect of an estate settled by the will of the testator were charged on the settled property by orders of the Board or Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, and the instalments in respect thereof, consisting of capital and interest, were paid by the tenant for life, whose life estate commenced on June 25, 1928. Of the instalments so paid, the sum of £1,742 2s. 6d. represented capital. Tithe annuities charged on the estate in consideration of the redemption of tithe rentcharges under orders made under the Tithe Act, 1918, s. 4 (2), were also paid by the tenant for life, and of the sums so paid £824 18s. was attributable to capital. The tenant for life claimed that she was entitled to be repaid these sums of £1,742 2s. 6d. and £824 18s. out of capital moneys subject to the settlement as, under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (xiii), and s. 73 (1) (xvi), respectively, they were payable out of capital.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of s. 73 (1) (xiii), “redemption” referred to a compounding of future payments, and a rentcharge was not redeemed, within the meaning of the paragraph, by the payment of periodical sums as they became due, and, therefore, the tenant for life was not entitled to be recouped out of capital moneys subject to the settlement in respect of so much of the instalments paid by her as represented capital.

(ii) an annuity was discharged, within the meaning of s. 73 (1) (xvi), only by being commuted for a lump sum, and not by being paid as it fell due, and, therefore, the tenant for life was not entitled to be recouped in respect of so much of the tithe annuities paid by her as was attributable to capital.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by the tenant for life of an estate settled by the will of the testator, Colonel Samuel Sandbach, applying for recoupment out of the capital moneys subject to the settlement (a) of so much of the instalments paid by her in respect of improvement rentcharges as represented capital, and (b) of so much of the sums paid by her in respect of tithe annuities as was attributable to capital. The application to the court was made under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 93 and s. 113, and it was contended by the tenant for life that, under s. 73 (1) (xiii) and s. 73 (1) (xvi), respectively, the sums were payable out of the capital moneys subject to the settlement, and, therefore, she having paid them, she was entitled to be recouped out of capital. The facts appear in the judgment.

Nov. 23. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The testator, Colonel Samuel Sandbach, made his will on Apr. 12, 1923, and died on Mar. 24, 1928. The effect of the will, so far as relevant, was to create a life tenancy in an estate in Wales in favour of his niece, the applicant in these proceedings, with remainder to her son, the infant respondent, as tenant in tail male. The trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1925, are also respondents to the summons.

The applicant's life estate commenced on June 25, 1928, on the termination of a preceding life estate. Subsequently to that date, the applicant has paid, or there has been paid on her behalf, or deducted from her income as tenant for life, all the instalments consisting of capital and interest in respect of certain loans made by the Lands Improvement Co. to the testator or to herself and charged on the settled property by orders of the Board or Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries. The total amount of so much of the instalments so paid as represents capital is £1,742 2s. 6d. There have also been similarly paid or deducted certain tithe annuities charged on the estate in consideration of the redemption of tithe rentcharges under orders made under the Tithe Act, 1918,

s. 4 (2). Of the sums so paid or deducted, the sum of £824 18s. is attributable to capital. The applicant now asks that these sums of £1,742 2s. 6d. and £824 18s. may be recouped to her out of capital moneys subject to the settlement.

As regards the former sum, her case appears to rest on the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 73 (1) (xiii), and as regards the latter sum on s. 73 (1) (xvi) of the same Act. Section 73 (1) sets out the modes in which capital money arising under the Act is to be invested or applied. With regard to the first point, the words in s. 73 (1) (xiii) are:

“In redemption of an improvement rentcharge, that is to say, a rentcharge (temporary or permanent) created, whether before or after the commencement of this Act, in pursuance of any Act of Parliament, with the object of paying off any money advanced for defraying the expenses of an improvement of any kind authorised by Part I of sched. III to this Act.”

It was in consequence of the decision in Re Knatchbull's Settled Estate (1) that the Settled Land Acts (Amendment) Act, 1887, was passed, and the words in s. 73 (1) (xiii) of the Act of 1925 are said to replace s. 1 of the Act of 1887, though the wording is by no means the same. In my judgment, the difference is vital. While s. 1 of the Act of 1887 refers to money expended in redeeming or “otherwise providing for the payment” of the rentcharge, s. 73 (1) (xiii) of the present Act refers to redemption only, and the decisions in Re Lord Sudeley's Settled Estates (2), Re Lord Egmont's Settled Estates (3), Re Howard's Settled Estates (4), and Re Dalison's Settled Estates (5), have, in my judgment, no present application. I think that a rentcharge is not “redeemed” within the meaning of the relevant words, by the payment of the periodical sums as they become due, though it is, of course, thereby “otherwise provided for.” “Redemption” in the context refers, I think, to a compounding of future payments, and I think that, as regards the £1,742 2s. 6d., the application fails.

With regard to the second point, the words in s. 73 (1) (xvi) of the Act of 1925 are:

“In the purchase of an annuity charged under s. 4 of the Tithe Act, 1918, on the settled land or any part thereof, or in the discharge of such part of any such annuity as does not represent interest.”

The question is whether an annuity is discharged, within the meaning of that word, by being paid as it falls due or only by being commuted for a lump sum, as is suggested in WOLSTENHOLME AND CHERRY'S CONVEYANCING STATUTES, 12th ed., p. 1103, in the note to s. 73 (1) (xvi). I think, on the whole, that the latter is the correct view, and that this application also fails as regards the £824 18s. I will, however, allow the costs of all parties to this application to be taxed and raised and paid out of capital moneys.

Order accordingly.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 10, 13, 14, 27, 1950.]

Gift—Donatio mortis causa—Bank balances—Deposit accounts—Delivery—Animus donandi—Sufficiency of deposit books as indicia of title.

The deceased was an elderly widow with no blood relations, her best friends being her deceased husband's nephew, F.B., and his wife, G.B., to whom she had given a house jointly in 1940. On Feb. 22, 1948, she met with a serious accident and was taken to hospital where she was visited by F.B. and G.B., sometimes separately and sometimes together. On Mar. 4 she asked G.B., who had visited her alone, to go to her house and find her bank books. She told G.B. to keep the books and "if anything happens to me I want you and F. to have the money at the banks." The books in question were deposit account books of (a) the Post Office Savings Bank, (b) the London Trustee Savings Bank, (c) Barclays Bank, Ltd., (d) Westminster Bank, Ltd., and (e) Midland Bank, Ltd. On Mar. 11 G.B. again visited the deceased, and, on being asked if she had found the books, she replied: "Yes." At a later date, the deceased told G.B. that she would like her to pay an outstanding bill and left it to G.B. to arrange how it should be paid. G.B. arranged for the manager of a branch of the Midland Bank to come to the hospital on the morning of Mar. 25 and the deceased put her mark to a document instructing the bank to pay the bill out of her deposit account with it. On the evening of Mar. 25 F.B. and G.B. were asked to visit the deceased at once as she had had a relapse. The deceased told them that she knew that she was on the danger list and asked F.B. whether he had her bank books. He replied: "Yes, we have got them—well, as a matter of fact, G. has got them." The deceased said: "Don't forget, if anything happens to me, I want you to have the money in the banks," and before they left she repeated that she wanted them both to have that money. On Mar. 29 she died. F.B. and G.B. claimed that she had made a valid donatio mortis causa to them of the sums standing to her credit with the banks (with the exception of the sum in the account with the Midland Bank).

HELD: (i) on the facts, it was clear that the deceased treated F.B. and G.B. as one entity and that they regarded themselves in that light, and, even if the original delivery of the bank books was to G.B. alone, the events of the evening of Mar. 25 impressed it with a new character so that it became a delivery to both, and, therefore, there was a sufficient delivery to them to support a good donatio mortis causa.

(ii) as she did not reserve in advance the right to deal with the bank balances, the deceased parted with dominion over the balances when she parted with possession of the bank books, and the precatory formula used by her when asking G.B. to see that the outstanding bill was paid was consistent with her having parted with dominion. At most, this request and the events of the morning of Mar. 25 might amount to a partial revocation, an effective donatio of the rest being made or re-affirmed that evening.

Reddel v. Dobree (1839) (10 Sim. 244), distinguished.

(iii) where the subject-matter of an alleged donatio mortis causa consisted of a chose in action, incapable itself of physical delivery, the real test of the validity of the gift was whether the instrument, of which there had been a physical delivery, was the essential indicia or evidence of title, possession or production of which entitled the possessor to the money or property purported to be given, and it was not essential that every term of the contract out of which the chose in action arose should be stated in the document of title; therefore, the gift of the balance standing to the credit of the deceased in the Post Office Savings Bank account was a good donatio, and so, too, was the gift of the balance with the London Trustee Savings Bank, although the book in that case did not contain a statement of the rate of interest allowed; in respect of the balances standing to the credit of the deceased in her deposit accounts with the joint stock banks (Barclays Bank, Ltd. and Westminster Bank, Ltd.), the condition stated in each of the deposit books, that production thereof was essential on any withdrawal from the account, should, on the evidence, be taken to have remained operative, even though the strict contractual practice might not always have been followed by the banks in their dealings with other customers; so the deposit books were the essential indicia of title and delivery of the books amounted to a transfer of the bank balances (it being immaterial that these books, also, contained no statement of the rate of interest payable); and, therefore, there was a valid donatio mortis causa to F.B. and G.B. by the deceased of her deposits with the Post Office Savings Bank, the London Trustee Savings Bank, Barclays Bank, Ltd. and Westminster Bank, Ltd.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of ROXBURGH, J., dated July 14, 1950, in an action against the Treasury Solicitor as administrator ad colligenda bona of the estate of the deceased, Elisabeth Lucy Birch. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the deceased made a valid donatio mortis causa to them of sums of money standing to the credit of her account at her death in (a) a Post Office savings bank, (b) the London Trustee Savings Bank, and (c) deposit accounts with Barclays Bank, Ltd., Westminster Bank, Ltd., and Midland Bank, Ltd., respectively. ROXBURGH, J., held that there was no valid donatio mortis causa to the plaintiffs, and he further held that only the sum standing to the deceased's credit in the Post Office savings bank was capable of being the subject-matter of a valid donatio. On appeal, the plaintiffs abandoned their claim to the sum standing to the deceased's credit with the Midland Bank, Ltd. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.

Denys B. Buckley for the Treasury Solicitor.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. The question raised on this appeal is whether on the evidence there was a valid donatio mortis causa of certain bank accounts to the two plaintiffs, who are husband and wife. The learned trial judge has held that there was not. To answer this question involves answering at least three subordinate questions: (i) Was there a sufficient "delivery" to the two plaintiffs of the subject-matter of the alleged gift to support a donatio? (ii) Was there the requisite animus donandi, having regard especially to acts done after the delivery, which are said to amount to the assertion and exercise of continued dominion by the alleged donor over the subject-matter of the alleged gift? (iii) Assuming that there was a sufficient delivery and the requisite animus, then, seeing that the subject-matter of the gift is a number of bank balances (choses in action incapable themselves of physical delivery) and that documents relating to them were delivered, were these documents such indicia of title as are necessary to constitute a valid donatio mortis causa of choses in action? The defendant, the Treasury Solicitor, in his capacity of administrator ad colligenda bona of the estate of the deceased, says that a negative answer should be given to all three questions save as to part of the third, and that there was, accordingly, no valid donatio.

The material facts may be summarised as follows. The deceased, a frail elderly lady, who by extreme frugality had accumulated substantial savings—the bank balances involved in this case amount to about £8,000—suffered a serious accident on Feb. 22, 1948, and was taken to St. Mary's Hospital, Paddington. She had no blood relations, but her best friends were Frank Birch, a nephew of her late husband, and his wife, Gladys. They are the first and second plaintiffs respectively in this case. They together, or one or other of them separately, visited her in hospital on various occasions between the accident and her death, which occurred on Mar. 29. As to who was present at which visit there are some discrepancies between the pleadings and the evidence, the importance of which we think the learned judge has over-estimated. The most important, at first sight, is that, while para. 3 of the statement of claim appears to say that both plaintiffs were present at a visit to the deceased which can be identified as having occurred on Mar. 4, 1948, both plaintiffs are quite positive that the first plaintiff, Frank Birch, was not present on that day. Actually, as the learned judge himself acknowledged, para. 3 is ambiguous and Frank Birch's evidence is consistent with one of its possible meanings. Apart from this, counsel for the plaintiffs stated that he had from the first been instructed that Frank Birch was not present at the interview on Mar. 4, and counsel for the defendant accepted his assurance. It is quite true that, where the court is dependent wholly on the evidence of interested parties, it must test such evidence somewhat rigorously, but the learned judge, after seeing and hearing the witnesses examined and cross-examined, came to the conclusion that, though the recollection of Frank Birch was deficient, both plaintiffs were completely honest.

The evidence as to the material visits and what passed at each is not very long, but, as the exact words used are important, some of it must be quoted verbatim. The second plaintiff, Gladys Birch, seems to have gone every Thursday, Thursday being visiting day. Frank Birch, when he went, went on Sundays, except that he was a party on the final visit of Mar. 25, which was a Thursday. The crucial visits were those of Mar. 4 and 25. We will consider the evidence, in relation to these visits, first of Gladys Birch. Gladys said (in her evidence in chief) that on Mar. 4 she visited the deceased unaccompanied by Frank and the deceased said to her:

- A "Would I [Gladys] go to Bickerton Road [deceased's house] and . . . I would find a black handbag with her bank books in, adding: 'I want you to take them home and keep them, and if anything happens to me I want you and Frank to have the money at the banks'."

Gladys replied: "Nothing is going to happen to you," but the deceased disagreed, saying: "No . . . I think I am finished." On the next Thursday

- B (Mar. 11) Gladys went again, was asked if she had found the books, and said: "Yes." In cross-examination Gladys said she was quite certain that she and Frank were "to have the money in the banks." On the evening of Mar. 25 Frank and Gladys were told that the deceased had had a relapse and were asked to visit her at once. They thought it tactful to pretend that it was a casual visit, but the deceased was not deceived and said: "I know I have been 'slated'" (i.e., put on the danger list). She then "stared at Frank Birch for a long time" and said: "You have got my bank books, Frank?" He said:

"Oh yes, we have got them—well, as a matter of fact, Gladys has got them."

- D Later, the deceased said:

"Now don't forget, if anything happens to me, I want you to have the money in the banks."

Then later, according to Gladys:

- E ". . . before I left her I made her comfortable and said: 'Goodbye,' and she said: 'Now don't forget, I want you to have that money'."

In cross-examination Gladys re-affirmed this account of this interview. Frank Birch's evidence is shorter. He said that he and Gladys saw the deceased together on Feb. 22, immediately after the accident. He was not present on Mar. 4. The next time he "came into the picture" was on the evening of Mar. 25, the final interview, of which in his evidence in chief his account tallies

- F exactly with that of Gladys, except that the final remark of the deceased, according to him, was: "I want you both" or "I want you and Glad to have that money," and not I want "you"—a term ambiguous as to number—to have it. In cross-examination he was pressed with discrepancies between the pleadings and his and Gladys' evidence, but was quite positive as to what happened on Mar. 25. On this occasion (he said) the deceased definitely said, not "I want you both to have the books," but "I want you both to have the money."

- G This evidence establishes beyond question that certain prerequisites of a valid donatio mortis causa were fulfilled. The gift, if otherwise valid, was made in contemplation of death, and was to take effect conditionally on death occurring and in that event only. This, however, leaves outstanding the three issues indicated above.

- H (i) The first issue is whether on this evidence there was a sufficient delivery to the two alleged donees. Physically, delivery on Mar. 4 was into the hands of Gladys Birch alone, and it is objected that, where there are two donees, it must be to both. It is, however, clear that A. may take delivery as agent for B., and, presumably, where a joint gift is intended, A. may take delivery for himself and as agent for B. Is it, however, a proper inference from the evidence in this case that the delivery to Gladys on Mar. 4 was, or became, actually or constructively, a delivery to both? The defendant says "No." The only delivery (says the defendant) was to Gladys, and this was a delivery to her as agent only for the deliveror, the deceased—no doubt, with a direction to deal with the object delivered, and to deal with it in a way which, no doubt, if the direction were carried out, would benefit Frank as well. That, however, does not make it a delivery to Frank as well as to Gladys. There is no evidence, so the argument runs, that on Mar. 4 Gladys had authority to take delivery on behalf of Frank, and nothing the deceased did could create such an authority. A

On this issue, the following circumstances are relevant. (a) Some years earlier, in 1940, the deceased had given and conveyed a house to the two jointly. (b) In law the delivery need not be contemporaneous with the gift. It can precede it: see Cain v. Moon (1). (c) The delivery may acquire a new quality as the result of events subsequent to its physical occurrence. Thus, a delivery made in the first instance alio intuitu, e.g., for safe custody only, may acquire from subsequent events the complexion of a delivery sufficient to support a donatio mortis causa: see Cain v. Moon (1). The relevant supervening events in this case are those of the evening of Mar. 25, when the final tripartite interview occurred. The material passages in the evidence have been quoted. It is transparently clear from this evidence that the deceased treated the two plaintiffs (as she had previously, when giving them a house) as interchangeable, or as a single entity—"one flesh." It is equally plain that the plaintiffs regarded themselves in that light. The deceased, well knowing that Gladys was the person who had actually taken delivery of the bank books on Mar. 4, gazes fixedly, not at Gladys, but at Frank, and asks not her, but him whether he has the bank books. He says: B C

"Yes, we have got them—well, as a matter of fact, Glad has got them." D

Such language either means nothing or it means that these two amount in the eyes of the speaker to the same thing, and Gladys stands by, acquiescing without protest in this tacit identification. What passed at that interview would seem to impress on a delivery, which may originally have been a delivery into the hands of Gladys only, a new character (and we know that a delivery can acquire a new character as the result of supervening events)—the character of a delivery to both. None of the parties at this interview drew any distinction between husband and wife, any more than they drew any distinction between bank books and the balances represented thereby. E

Even if the matter had been otherwise—if counsel for the defendant had been right in contending that the delivery on Mar. 4 was and remained a delivery to Gladys as agent for the deliveror only, with directions to deal with the thing delivered in a certain way—yet it has been decided that in certain events delivery to X. subject to a trust in favour of Y. may be valid. In Hills v. Hills (2) it was held that there could be a valid donatio mortis causa though coupled with a trust. In that case ROLFE, B., said (8 M. & W. 404): F

"... I cannot see how the annexation of a trust to the gift can make any difference. If it be lawful so to give the property out and out to the party for his own use, I cannot see that it makes any difference that with it he is to pay for a particular thing. If a man on his death-bed gives another £1,000, is it any addition to the evils attending this mode of bestowing property that he attaches a condition to it—as, for instance, that he stipulates that his brother shall receive an outfit to India? The case of Blount v. Burrow (3) is expressly in point, and disposes of the question; and I have no doubt that other cases to the same effect might be found." G H

So here, a delivery of the bank books to Gladys on Mar. 4, with a direction in the event of the deceased's death to withdraw the balances and hand half to Frank, might well be a valid donatio, and produce the practical result for which the plaintiffs contend. It is, however, not necessary to decide this point. For these reasons we think that there was a delivery sufficient to comply with the requirements of a donatio.

(ii) The second outstanding question is: Assuming the other conditions of a valid donatio to be satisfied, is the present disposition vitiated on the ground that the deceased, though she parted with possession, did not part with dominion over the subject-matter of the gift? For this she must do, or there is no donatio. The argument that the deceased retained dominion is founded on an incident which occurred on the morning of Mar. 25—before the final interview between the parties that evening. The deceased owed a builder, called Mason, a sum of £98 15s. 10d., and was anxious that this debt should be paid. Gladys Birch saw her on Mar. 11 and “later on” found this bill. She mentioned this to the deceased “subsequently” (no date can be identified, but it was before Mar. 25). Gladys Birch said in her evidence:

“I took her the bill and she said: ‘I would like you to pay this because I promised to pay him quickly and he did the work. Would you go and draw some money?’ I said: ‘Well, where shall I draw the money?’ She said: ‘Oh, I leave that entirely to you. You have my books. You can draw it where you like.’”

Thereupon Gladys Birch saw Mr. Andrews, the manager of a branch of the Midland Bank, Ltd., a day or two before Mar. 25. According to Andrews, Gladys Birch explained the situation and told him that the deceased wanted arrangements made to pay this account. It was agreed that she and Andrews should go round to the deceased at the hospital on the morning of Mar. 25 and that they should get the deceased to give the bank an order to pay this sum to the builders. On Mar. 25 the deceased put her mark on a document in the presence of Andrews and Gladys Birch. This document, which is addressed to the Upper Holloway branch of the Midland Bank, Ltd., reads:

“Please pay Mr. E. Mason . . . £98 15s. 10d. . . . to the debit of my deposit account with you.”

It is witnessed by Andrews and Gladys Birch. This is the transaction relied on as showing that the deceased had not parted with dominion over these balances. In support of this contention counsel for the defendant cited Reddel v. Dobree (4). In that case A., in declining health, delivered to B. a locked cash box, telling her to go at his death to his son for the key and that the box contained money for herself, but that he should want it every three months while he lived. He called for it twice before he died (no doubt, drawing from it) and re-delivered it on each occasion to B. It was held by SIR LANCELOT SHADWELL, V.-C., that A. had retained dominion by reserving in advance the right to deal with it between its delivery and his death, and keeping control of the key through his son as his agent. In the present case there was no such antecedent reservation. The precatory formula used by the deceased before the final interview, “I would like you to pay this,” is consistent with her having parted with dominion. At most, this request and the events of the morning of Mar. 25 might amount to a partial revocation, an effective donatio of the rest being either made or re-affirmed in the interview later that day. We are of opinion, accordingly, that this point, too, fails.

(iii) If we are right in concluding that the evidence supports in other respects a valid donatio mortis causa, there remains the more difficult question whether any and, if so, which of the sums of money specified in para. 6 of the statement of claim are, from their nature and in the light of the evidence given on the defendant’s behalf, capable of being the subject-matter of a donatio. On this point the learned judge was of opinion that the sum of £3,328 9s. 6d., standing to the deceased’s credit in the Post Office Savings Bank was so capable. In this respect he followed the decision of BYRNE, J., in Re Weston (5). The decision of BYRNE, J. (in which he followed and applied the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Dillon (6)) has now stood unchallenged for close on half a century and counsel for the defendant has addressed to us no argument against its soundness. It, therefore, follows that no question arises as to this sum of money, though it may be necessary to refer to the facts relevant and peculiar to a Post Office Savings Bank deposit in discussing the problem as it affects the other deposits in this case. On the other hand, counsel for the plaintiffs has abandoned any claim to the sum of £357 12s. 6d. to the deceased's credit with the Midland Bank, Ltd., and this item, therefore, disappears from the case. There remain, accordingly, the three sums to the credit of the deceased, viz., (a) £55 with the London Trustee Savings Bank, (b) £646 11s. 2d. with Barclays Bank, Ltd. and (c) £1,353 1s. 8d. with Westminster Bank, Ltd. In considering these three cases the learned judge applied the test stated by LUXMOORE, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Chancery Division, in Delgoffe v. Fader (7). That learned judge said ([1939] 3 All E.R. 685):

"The test of whether the delivery of the document constitutes a good donatio mortis causa of a chose in action depends on the answer to the question whether the document expresses the terms on which the subject-matter of the chose in action is held by the donor, or the terms under which the chose in action came into existence."

Counsel for the defendant in this court has relied on this statement, and has contended, accordingly, that in the case of a chose in action actual delivery of the document constituting the evidence or indicia of title must fulfil one, if not both, of the following conditions, viz., (a) that production and delivery of the document must be essential to the recovery of the chose in action, and (b) that it must contain all, or all the essential, terms of the contract out of which the chose in action arises. In the present case the documents in question are, of course, the relevant bank deposit books. For reasons which we shall have to consider presently, it is claimed by counsel for the defendant that in no one of the three cases (save, perhaps, for the London Trustee Savings Bank, as regards the first condition) were the conditions satisfied. It is said by counsel for the defendant that, so far as concerns the first condition, the evidence called by him proved that, whatever might have been the strict contractual terms, the practice of the joint stock banks has not been to require production of the deposit book as a condition of any withdrawal, and, as far as concerns the second condition, not all the terms of the relevant contracts are to be found stated, or even referred to, in any of the books.

We have examined numerous authorities relating to this difficult subject-matter, but, although it seems clearly established that there may be a valid donatio mortis causa of property other than such only as is capable of manual delivery, it must be confessed that there was, at any rate before Delgoffe v. Fader (7), no clear or precise statement of the limiting conditions applicable in such cases. The English law in regard to donationes mortis causa must be taken largely to rest on the well-known judgment of LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in Ward v. Turner (8). As appears from LORD HARDWICKE's judgment, the English law relating to donationes mortis causa (derived, at least in part, from the civil law) is in many respects anomalous. It was, indeed, questioned at one time whether the old decisions supporting donationes mortis causa were consistent with the Wills Act, 1837, on the ground that they are in a sense testamentary in that full effect is not given to them until the donor's death. Being at that date incomplete, the gifts are then (unlike other gifts or trusts) rendered perfect and complete by the law. In Re Beaumont (9) BUCKLEY, J., said ([1902] 1 Ch. 892):

"A donatio mortis causa is a singular form of gift. It may be said to be of an amphibious nature, being a gift which is neither entirely inter vivos nor testamentary. It is an act inter vivos by which the donee is to have the absolute title to the subject of the gift not at once but if the donor dies. If the donor dies the title becomes absolute not under but as against his executor. In order to make the gift valid it must be made so as to take complete effect on the donor's death."

Because of these peculiar characteristics the courts will examine any case of alleged donatio mortis causa and reject it if in truth what is alleged as a donatio is an attempt to make a nuncupative will, or a will in other respects not complying with the forms required by the Wills Acts. Such, as I read it, was Reddel v. Dobree (4), where the donor stipulated that the box delivered to the claimant should be returned to him (the donor) every three months, thereby preserving to the donor an effective dominion over the contents which he could change from time to time. For the same reasons it is of the essence of a valid donatio that there should be traditio, i.e., delivery in fact of the thing given to the donee. As LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., observed (2 Ves. Sen. 442) in Ward v. Turner (8), mere symbolic delivery will not suffice. It might, therefore, be supposed that there could be a valid donatio only of such subject-matters as were capable of actual manual delivery. This, however, is clearly not the law. Thus (as LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., himself noted (ibid., 443)), where the thing given is of a bulky nature, the handing to the donee of the key of the box or place where the thing is kept will be sufficient and is not to be regarded as merely symbolic. LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., summed the matter up by stating (ibid., 444) that it is impossible to make a donatio mortis causa "without a transfer, or something amounting to that."

The question then is: Where actual transfer does not or cannot take place, what will "amount to that"? As a matter of principle, delivery of the indicia of title (viz., the document or thing the possession or production of which entitles the possessor to the money or property purported to be given), as distinct from mere evidence of title, should satisfy LORD HARDWICKE'S condition. On this ground, in our judgment, the validity of a donatio of money standing to the donor's credit in a Post Office Savings Bank deposit, or a mortgage debt, should be sustained, and it appears to us irrelevant in such cases whether all the terms of the contract out of which a chose in action arises are stated in the document of title. It is true that in Re Weston (5) BYRNE, J., founded himself on the view that the document, i.e., the deposit book, "expresses the terms on which [the money] is held, and shows what the contract between the parties is," and the learned judge cited Moore v. Darton (10) and Re Dillon (6). He said ([1902] 1 Ch. 685):

"An examination of the savings bank book in the present case appears to me to show a fulfilment of the test; and although every rule regulating the contract is not set out in the book itself, all the essential rules are."

The learned judge, however, went on to state (ibid.) that the deposit book was not a mere receipt, but that:

"It must, as stated on the face of it, be produced whenever any money is deposited or withdrawn . . ."

In Moore v. Darton (10) the question was whether there had been a valid donatio to the debtor of a debt of £500. The thing handed over was in the form of a receipt, which was signed by the debtor and was as follows:

"Received Oct. 22, 1843, of Miss Darton £500, to bear interest at four per cent. per annum, but not to be withdrawn at less than six months' notice."

In regard to that document SIR JAMES KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., said (4 De G. & Sm. 520):

"The document here has been called a receipt, and is a receipt in a sense, but it is not a receipt in the ordinary acceptation of that term . . ."

The debt was a debt carrying interest. A mere debt of £500 would have arisen from a loan, without any writing. But it would not have been a debt carrying interest, without a contract to that effect beyond the advance. That particular contract, I agree, might have been entered into without writing; but, as it was created by writing, proof of the writing, if possible, was essential to recovery upon the contract. This writing was therefore in a sense essential to the proof of the contract; and it is this writing which was in substance delivered mortis causa to the person owing the money. In my opinion it is consistent with what was said by LORD HARDWICKE, LORD ROSSLYN and LORD ELDON, with the civil law and our own, to hold, as I do, that this was a sufficient delivery to constitute a donatio mortis causa, which, in my judgment, it was intended to be."

This passage from the judgment of SIR JAMES KNIGHT BRUCE, V.-C., seems to me to show that the ratio decidendi was that, since, in the case before him, the contract of loan was recorded in writing, proof and production of the writing was essential to the recovery of the debt—in other words, that the document was the essential indicia of title, and delivery of it "amounted to transfer" of the debt. It is, no doubt, true that all the material terms of the contract were stated in the writing, but it was because of that fact that the document was the essential evidence of the contract. In our judgment, it is the latter circumstance, and not the incidental fact that all the terms of the contract were recorded in the writing, which satisfied the test of a valid donatio.

In Re Dillon (6), which appears to be the only case in this court relevant to the present question, the problem arose in regard to a banker's deposit note. The deposit note stated all the terms of the contract save the rate of interest then presently payable, but it contained on the back of it a form of cheque. As appears from the argument, the real question which was raised was whether, because of the indorsed cheque form, the result was that the document, on the face of it a deposit note, was, in truth, no more than a cheque payable to bearer. If it were, there would be little doubt that it could not be the subject of a valid donatio. As BUCKLEY, J., stated ([1902] 1 Ch. 894) in Re Beaumont (9):

" . . . in order that the gift may be valid, it must I think be shown that the donor handed over either property, or the indicia of title to property, which belonged to him. His own cheque is not property; it is only a revocable order such that if the banker acts on it the donee will have the money to which it relates."

The decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Dillon (6) was, however, that the presence of the cheque form did not convert what would otherwise have been a deposit note, the indicia of title to the sum deposited, into a mere bearer cheque. COTTON, L.J., said (44 Ch.D. 81) that, in the absence of evidence why banks put a memorandum of this kind on their deposit notes, he came to the conclusion that:

" . . . in order to preserve convenient evidence when the money is withdrawn, they put the form of cheque on the note, so that when filled up and signed it may be preserved as a receipt, and not that they make it a part of the bargain that they will not pay unless this cheque is signed and produced . . . I cannot think that the requiring this cheque to be signed puts the account on any footing different from that of an ordinary deposit account, so as to prevent the fund from being given away as a donatio mortis causa."

Later in his judgment (ibid., 82) he used the language on which counsel for the defendant has mainly founded his argument:

A "The case of Duffield v. Elwes (11) shows that there may be a good donatio mortis causa of an instrument which does not pass by delivery, and that the executors of the donor are trustees for the donee for the purpose of giving effect to the gift. The case of Moore v. Darton (10) is very instructive as to the class of instruments which are subjects of donatio mortis causa. There a document was executed when a deposit of money was made. The mere fact of the deposit would create a debt; but the document, besides acknowledging the receipt of the money, expressed the terms on which it was held, and showed what the contract between the parties was. It was held that the delivery of that document was a good donatio mortis causa of the money deposited, and so, in my opinion, was the delivery of the deposit note in the present case."

B In our judgment, and having regard to the circumstances of the case, COTTON, L.J., cannot be taken as laying down that, in a case of alleged donatio of a chose in action such as a sum of money on deposit with a bank, the deposit note or book must contain all, or all the material, terms of the contract. Neither LINDLEY, L.J., nor LOPES, L.J., gave any support, in their judgments, for that proposition. Both those learned judges confined themselves to disposing of the argument based on the indorsed form of cheque, and, having disposed of that argument, treated the deposit note as having been established by authority as a good subject-matter of a donatio mortis causa. In our judgment, accordingly, BYRNE, J., in Re Weston (5) and LUXMOORE, L.J., in Delgoffe v. Fader (7) went further than was necessary in stating that a record of all the essential terms of the contract in the document handed over was a condition D or test of the validity of the donatio mortis causa. For reasons which we have attempted to give, we think that the real test is whether the instrument handed over is the essential indicia or evidence of title, possession or production of which entitles the possessor to the money or property purported to be given, so that delivery of the instrument "amounts to a transfer." We must not, however, be taken to be casting any doubt on the correctness of the decision E in Delgoffe v. Fader (7), for, as LUXMOORE, L.J., observed ([1939] 3 All E.R. 687), on the evidence before him, the deposit book there in question " . . . was in no way essential to be produced if the depositor had required to withdraw her money . . . [The donor] had no current account, but she in fact operated her deposit account by making deposits and drawing cheques upon it, just as she would have operated a current account."

F We turn, accordingly, to the facts relating to the three deposits. Having regard to the view which we have expressed, it is unnecessary to consider whether in each case all the terms of the contract between depositor and bank are stated in the respective books, or whether the books record all the conditions on which the deposits were made, but we must not be taken to be expressing G the view that a negative answer ought to be given to these questions. In the case of the London Trustee Savings Bank it is true that there is no statement of the rate of interest allowed. For that, it is necessary to look at the elaborate book of rules duly certified in accordance with the Trustee Savings Bank Act, 1863. On the face of the book, however, appears a reference to the Act of 1863 and we are not satisfied that, on any view, a statement of the H rate of interest would be necessary. As we have already pointed out, the rate current at the date of deposit was not stated in the note in Re Dillon (6). It is not clear that even in the case of the Post Office account every term of the contract appears from the deposit book. There is a page headed "Information," which contains statements as to withdrawals and rate of interest, but also the statement that "further information is contained in a booklet obtainable at post offices, etc." For similar reasons we do not think that the absence in the Barclays bank book of any statement of the rate of interest could, on any view, be material, for in the case of joint stock banks it must, we should have thought, be taken to be clearly implied that the rate was the rate of interest allowed by these banks from time to time on deposits. The case of Westminster Bank is more difficult, for in that case the book contains no reference to interest at all. One view would be that in that case no interest was, in fact, payable and none was credited in the book until the end of the account, but it is at least doubtful if this was the true contractual position. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the matter further.

What, then, is the evidence in this case as to the necessity for production of the books on any withdrawal—for this, in the view which we take, is the essential matter? In each case, on the face of the deposit book, such production was, beyond doubt, made a term or condition of the deposit, but, as we have said, counsel for the defendant has contended that, whatever the strict contractual terms, as a matter of practice—at least in the case of the two joint stock banks—such production was not required, and it is, perhaps, a matter of common knowledge (as was found to be the fact in Delgoffe v. Fader (7)) that a so-called deposit account may, by arrangement between banker and customer, be operated much as a current account so that the deposit book is no more than an ordinary bank pass book. What is the evidence here? In the case of the London Trustee Savings Bank counsel for the defendant did not, and could not, press the point far, as the local actuary, Mr. Skeets, said:

“Really, we always insist on the production of the pass book except in exceptional circumstances where hardship may be caused—for instance with a lost pass book.”

The requirements of the two joint stock banks, Barclays Bank, Ltd. and Westminster Bank, Ltd., are, no doubt, less stringent, but, in our opinion, the evidence in the present case cannot be said to go anything like so far as that in Delgoffe v. Fader (7). The evidence is, in our view, fairly summarised in two questions and answers, appearing in the cross-examinations of the respective witnesses from those banks:

(i) “Q.— . . . the bank is kind enough to its depositors on occasions to say ‘We will not trouble about it’ [i.e., the rule that production is required to obtain any payment]? A.—To stretch a point in their favour.”

(ii) “Q.— . . . the rule is that the book must be produced . . . but . . . the bank is a little easy about the rule and is prepared to relax it from time to time? A.—I think that is a very fair way of saying it.”

In the result, counsel for the defendant failed, in our judgment, to prove any such general practice as would lead to the conclusion that the contractual term as to production of the book in either case had become a dead letter, and certainly there was no evidence of any particular arrangement with the deceased. We think, accordingly, that in the case of both banks the condition stated on the face of the deposit books must be taken to have remained operative, i.e., that the book was and is the essential indicia of title and that delivery of the book “amounted to transfer” of the chose in action. The result is that, in our judgment, the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed as to the deposits in all three cases, the London Trustee Savings Bank, Barclays Bank and Westminster Bank. We think the result satisfactory, for it avoids, as it seems to us desirable to avoid, fine distinctions between moneys on deposit with the Post Office Savings Bank, on the one hand, and with trustee savings banks and joint stock banks, on the other, where in the latter cases the deposit account is a true deposit account as distinct from an ordinary current account.

WETHERALL & CO., LTD. v. STONE AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Birkett, L.J.J.), November 21, 1950.]

Landlord and Tenant—New lease—Joint landlords—Premises required for occupation by two of three landlords—Two landlords sons of third landlord—Reasonableness—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 5 (2), s. 5 (3) (b) (i).

By s. 5 (2) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, the court may order the grant of a new tenancy of business premises on the application of a tenant who alleges that compensation for loss of goodwill would be inadequate if the court "... considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable ...". By s. 5 (3), the grant of a new lease is not to be deemed reasonable "(b) if the landlord proves—(i) that the premises are required for occupation by himself, or, where the landlord is an individual, for occupation by a son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age." The tenant applied for the grant of a new lease of premises of which there were three joint landlords—a mother and her two sons, both of whom were aged over eighteen. The landlords, in resisting the application, relied on s. 5 (3) (b) (i), alleging that they required the premises for occupation by a firm in which the two sons were partners.

HELD: (i) s. 5 (3) (b) (i) did not afford the landlords any defence to the tenant's application as that provision did not apply where premises were required for occupation by only two out of three landlords, nor did the fact that a son of the third landlord required the premises for his occupation bring the landlords within the provision.

(ii) nevertheless, the fact that some of the landlords required to occupy the premises and that those landlords were the sons of the third landlord, were circumstances which the court should take into account in considering under s. 5 (2) whether it was reasonable to grant a new lease, and, on these facts, a new lease should not be granted.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE WALMSLEY, sitting at Salford County Court, dated July 4, 1950, whereby he granted the tenants a new lease under s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The facts are set out in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Hawser for the landlords.

Mais for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The tenant claimed a new lease under s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The landlords, Mrs. Stone and two of her sons, resisted the application, among other grounds, on the ground, under s. 5 (3) (b) (i), that they required the premises for their own occupation. The judge granted a new lease and the landlords appeal.

The point arising here is a narrow one. There was a report from the referee who found that there was adherent goodwill. Section 5 (1) of the Act provides that the tenant must show that he would be entitled to compensation under s. 4 in respect of the loss of goodwill and requires him to serve notice on the landlord requiring a new lease. Sub-section (2) provides:

"Where such a notice is so served, the tribunal, on application being made for the purpose either by the landlord or by the tenant not less than nine months before the termination of the tenancy, or, where the tenancy is terminated by notice, within two months after the service of the notice, may, if it considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, order the grant of a new tenancy for such period (being a term of years absolute) not exceeding fourteen years and on such terms as the tribunal may determine to be proper, but if the tribunal is precluded on any of the grounds mentioned in para. (b) of the following sub-section from making such an order the tribunal may award such compensation as is provided under the last foregoing section."

Sub-section (3) (b), with which we are concerned, provides:

"If the landlord proves—(i) that the premises are required for occupation by himself, or, where the landlord is an individual, for occupation by a son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age . . ."

the grant of a new lease shall not be deemed to be reasonable.

It appears that the two "son-landlords," if I may so express it, had a business in which their mother, the third landlord, was not a partner, and the learned judge construed s. 35 (b) (i) as inapplicable where there was more than one landlord if occupation was required by less than the total number of landlords or by the son of one landlord only. Counsel for the landlords submitted that that is wrong. He referred us to a case decided under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, sched. I, para. (h)—McIntyre v. Hardcastle (1)—in which this court construed somewhat similar words in the same sense as that given by the judge in the present case to the words of s. 5 (3) (b) (i). Schedule I to the Act of 1933 provides:

"A court shall, for the purposes of s. 3 of this Act, have power to make or give an order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply or for the ejection of a tenant therefrom without proof of suitable alternative accommodation (where the court considers it reasonable so to do) if . . . (h) the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord . . . for occupation as a residence for—(i) himself; or (ii) any son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age; or (iii) his father or mother."

In McIntyre v. Hardcastle (1) this court held that where there were two or more joint beneficial owners possession of a dwelling-house could be obtained under para. (h) only if the house were required for occupation as a residence for both or all of them. Counsel for the landlords submitted that the Acts of 1927 and 1933 have different purposes, and that that is so is clear. He relied on the definition in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 25 (1), of "landlord" as being

"any person who under a lease is, as between himself and the tenant or other lessee, for the time being entitled to the rents and profits of the demised premises payable under the lease" and also on the principle that where there are joint lessors either lessor can sue or give a receipt for the entire rent.

I do not, however, think that the words of s. 5 (3) (b) (i) of the Act of 1927 can be given any different construction from that given to the somewhat similar words in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, in McIntyre v. Hardcastle (1). I do not think the definition of "landlord" affects the matter. Substituting the plural for the singular, as is permitted under the Interpretation Act, 1889, unless the context otherwise requires, does not, I think, lead to the conclusion to which counsel for the landlords submits we should come, namely, that we should read the words in question as applying to a case where the landlords prove that the premises are required for occupation by one or more, but not all, of them. On that question of construction I think the judge was right.

- A But that does not dispose of the matter. Under s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1927 the court still has to consider whether the grant of a new tenancy is, in all the circumstances, reasonable. It may well be that that point was not stressed as an alternative point to the extent to which it should have been before the learned judge. We must first consider whether the fact that the landlords require the premises for one or more of them, but not all of them, is to be taken into account in considering whether it is reasonable to grant a new tenancy. It seems to me that it clearly is. In McIntyre v. Hardcastle (1) TUCKER, L.J., suggested ([1948] 1 All E.R. 699) that, in using the words that were being construed there, the legislature had not really present to its mind the problems which arose if there was more than one landlord. That may be so, and it may also apply to the words which we have to construe. But on any basis I think that the fact that some, but not all, of the landlords require the premises for their own occupation must be a circumstance which is relevant to be considered when deciding whether it is reasonable to grant a new tenancy. The court is told to consider all the circumstances. We have thought whether we ought to send the case back to the judge, but we wish to avoid unnecessary expense and we have come to the conclusion that we can, and should, deal with the matter here. I have come to the conclusion that, having regard to the fact that two out of three of the landlords require these premises to carry on their business, it would be unreasonable to grant a new tenancy to the tenant, long as he has been there. In Clift v. Taylor (2) SCOTT, L.J., pointed out ([1948] 2 All E.R. 116) that these provisions cut down the common law right of a landlord to grant a new lease to a new lessee on the conclusion of a tenancy, and this also must be borne in mind in considering whether it is reasonable to grant a new lease. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be allowed.

- E JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. McIntyre v. Hardcastle (1) dealt with a different Act, but the words there construed are sufficiently similar to the words here in question to make it wrong, in my view, for us to place a different construction on the words here, even if otherwise we might be disposed to do so. I also agree that, on the true construction of s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, the four cases set out in sub-s. (3) (b) in which it is not to be deemed to be reasonable to grant a new lease are not exhaustive. There is still the overriding requirement of sub-s. (2) that the tribunal must be satisfied that the grant of a new tenancy is, in all the circumstances, reasonable. I agree with my Lord that it appears from the judgment of the judge that he had not that overriding consideration in mind. Having applied himself to the objection under sub-s. (3) (b) (i) and decided that adversely to the landlords, he felt that nothing remained but to make the order granting a new lease whether he thought that was a reasonable thing to do or not.

- G I also agree that it is proper for us, having come to the conclusion that the judge did not address himself to the general question of reasonableness, to entertain that question ourselves and come to a decision upon it. Once it is appreciated that the general question of reasonableness is open, it can hardly be doubted that it would not be reasonable to grant a new lease in the circumstances of this case. H If all three landlords had wanted the premises for their own occupation, the case would have been outside the Act of 1927 by the express provision of sub-para (b) (i) of sub-s. (3). If the mother had been the only landlord, she could have claimed possession of the premises for occupation by the two sons. The surprising position arises, therefore, that while sub-s. (3) (b) (i) does not apply to the case, each of the three individuals collectively constituting "the landlords" requires possession for a purpose recognised by the Act. Each of the two sons requires the premises for occupation by himself; the mother requires the premises for occupation by the two sons. Yet that case cannot be brought within sub-s. (3) (b) (i) because, as a matter of strict construction, the precise terms of that provision are not satisfied. It seems to me that is the very kind of situation with which the overriding provision as to reasonableness was intended to deal. It is, if one may use the expression, ejusdem generis with the case dealt with in sub-para. (i) of sub-s. (3) (b). It is within the spirit, though not within the letter, of that provision. Accordingly, in my judgment, this is a case in which, although the grant of a new lease is not prohibited, it would not, in all the circumstances of the case, be reasonable to grant it. Accordingly, I agree that the appeal succeeds. A

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the two judgments which have been delivered and with the reasons which have been given for them. It is plain that before the judge the landlords relied very strongly on s. 5 (3) (b) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The judge held that their submission failed on the ground that they had not proved that they all required the premises for their occupation, although it appeared that two out of the three did. My Lord has indicated the view of the court on that question of construction. The second point which was raised by counsel for the landlords seems to be a point of very considerable substance. He said that, even if the judge were right in his construction of para. (b) (i), nevertheless that was not decisive. Counsel for the landlords submitted that, even if that point was decided against the landlords it was, nevertheless, incumbent on the judge to consider the words in sub-s. (2) of s. 5: B C

"... if the court considers that the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, order the grant of a new tenancy..."

I should have thought that when considering all the circumstances and the question of reasonableness the fact that two out of three of the landlords are proved to have required the premises for their own occupation was a very strong factor for consideration. I agree that this appeal should be allowed. D

Appeal allowed, without costs.

BURGESS v. COX.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), November 9, 10, 14, 15, 28, 1950.]

Sale of Land—Contract—Memorandum or note—Deficiency in memorandum supplied by second document—No reference in second document to memorandum—Omission of material term in alleged memorandum—Concession by plaintiff of term in favour of defendant to render contract enforceable—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 40 (1). G

On June 28, 1949, the defendant and N. discussed with the vendor the purchase from the latter of a holiday camp for £10,500. Everything on the site was to be included in the sale except certain furniture in a permanent dwelling-house ("The Laurels") on the site, some articles in a bungalow, and some electrical appliances and other articles belonging to the Ministry of Works. Although the camp was not being sold as a going concern, it was agreed that the consumable stock at the date of completion and also such deposits made by intending guests as were then outstanding should be included in the sale. N., as the defendant's agent, gave the vendor his cheque for £500, and wrote out the following document: H

" (Completion at an early date). Sale of Beach Approach Holiday Camp. Complete freehold. Exceptions of personal furniture in 'The Laurels' and of Mr. Burgess' (senior) bungalow (East Lodge) including stock on day of completion. Agreed sum £10,500." The vendor signed the document, but no document was signed by the defendant or N. On July 1, 1949, the defendant wrote to the vendor: " Dear Mr. Burgess, re Disposal of Beach Approach Holiday Camp. With reference to our visit to you on Tuesday last, I am very pleased we were able to mutually agree terms for the purchase of Beach Approach Holiday Camp, and shall look forward to taking over from you at an early date. I . . . believe that a really prompt completion date, as we both desire, is almost certain . . . I hope we did not bother you too much on Tuesday, but having reached agreement on this matter, I think final completion will most certainly be within the time you desired." The defendant was unable to raise the necessary money, and, subsequently, the plaintiff (the vendor's executrix, the vendor having died in the meantime) sold elsewhere for £8,000. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of contract, and the defendant pleaded (inter alia) the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40 (1).

HELD: (i) although there was no reference in the letter of July 1, 1949, to the document drawn on June 28, 1949, it was proper to look at the earlier document as recording the transaction referred to in the later, and, as it was clear on the face of the two documents that the same transaction was referred to, the defendant's signature to the letter of July 1, 1949, could be incorporated into the document of June 28, 1949,

(ii) but the omission of any reference in the two documents to the deposits which were to be included in the sale was an omission of a material term of the agreement and rendered the documents insufficient to satisfy the requirements of s. 40 (1), and it was not open to the plaintiff to concede the term in favour of the defendant so as to render the contract enforceable.

ACTION for damages for breach of a contract to purchase a holiday camp and equipment, or, alternatively, for rescission of the agreement and forfeiture of a deposit of £500. The defendant counterclaimed for the return of the deposit.

On June 28, 1949, the defendant with a Mr. Nicholas (his brother-in-law) and their respective wives visited the camp as intending purchasers. There was to be included in the sale the chalets, a dwelling-house called "The Laurels," stock, and furniture (except certain furniture in "The Laurels" and in a bungalow occupied by a relative of the vendor), certain electrical appliances and other articles on the site belonging to the Ministry of Works being excepted. After inspecting the property and after some discussion, the vendor offered to take £10,500, which was to include whatever consumable stocks there should be when the business was taken over and also such of the deposits made by intending guests as were then outstanding. The vendor was ill and was willing to sell at that price only on condition that completion should be prompt. Mr. Nicholas said that they would accept the offer, and, as the defendant's agent, gave the vendor his cheque for £500 to hold as a deposit. Mr. Nicholas suggested that something should be written to show what had been agreed, and he himself wrote: "Sale of Beach Approach Holiday Camp. Complete freehold. Exceptions of personal furniture in 'The Laurels' and of Mr. Burgess' (senior) bungalow (East Lodge) including stock on day of completion. Agreed sum £10,500." On the vendor's objecting that the document did not provide for completion by July 28, 1949, Mr. Nicholas wrote at the head of the document: "(Completion at an early date)." The vendor then signed the document, and handed it to Mr. Nicholas. The defendant made a copy for the vendor to keep. No document was signed by the defendant or Mr. Nicholas. On June 30, 1949, the vendor's solicitors wrote to the defendant stating that they were preparing a draft contract. On July 1, 1949, the defendant wrote to the vendor:

"Dear Mr. Burgess, re Disposal of Beach Approach Holiday Camp. With reference to our visit to you on Tuesday last, I am very pleased we were able to mutually agree terms for the purchase of Beach Approach Holiday Camp, and shall look forward to taking over from you at an early date. I have already taken energetic action in connection with this matter and have every reason to believe that a really prompt completion date, as we both desire, is almost certain. I am arranging part of the necessary capital through my bank and it may be that the bank will instruct their representative in Great Yarmouth to inspect the site and report to them . . . I hope we did not bother you too much on Tuesday, but having reached agreement on this matter, I think final completion will most certainly be within the time you desired."

The terms of the draft contract were eventually approved and signed by the vendor, but, although its terms were agreed by the defendant, he did not sign the counterpart as he found that he was unable to raise the money. On July 23, 1949, the defendant's solicitors wrote to the vendor's solicitors that

" . . . the survey of the property had not come up to his or the bank's expectations, and, consequently, the bank will not give as large an advance as he needs. We very much regret therefore that he will be unable to go on with his purchase . . . With regard to the deposit of £500, paid by our client's brother-in-law to [the vendor], we suggest that this is repaid direct to the gentleman concerned as he has not instructed us in this matter. We hope your client will be able to effect a sale satisfactorily elsewhere."

On Sept. 22, 1949, the vendor died. On Oct. 22, 1949, the solicitors to the vendor's executrix wrote acknowledging a letter from the defendant's solicitors (in which claim had been made to the return of the deposit) and stating that the executrix was prepared to carry out the contract, but in view of the correspondence she was endeavouring to find another purchaser. On Dec. 28, 1949, the executrix granted an option to another purchaser at the price of £8,000, and that option was exercised.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 28. HARMAN, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, A found that a valid oral contract had been concluded between the vendor and the defendant, and continued: The next defence set up is that there is no note or memorandum of the contract signed by or on behalf of the party to be charged, viz., the defendant, sufficient to satisfy the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40 (1). It is surprising at this date to find a new point arising out of B this section, which, together with its predecessor, the Statute of Frauds, 1677, s. 4, has been under judicial fire for over two centuries. It is well known that the terms of the memorandum need not all be contained in one document, but may be spread over many. Now here the document which contains (if any does contain) the terms of the bargain is signed only by the vendor, who is C not the party to be charged. The plaintiff (the executrix of the vendor), however, alleges that this defect is cured by the letter of July 1, 1949, signed by the defendant and to which I have already referred, and it was pleaded that this contained a reference to Mr. Nicholas' note of the agreement reached on June 28, 1949, the earlier document, sufficient to satisfy the statute. There is no direct reference in one document to the other, but it is now settled that this is not essential and that references in a later document to an agreement may be explained by D parol evidence, and if that evidence leads to another document containing the terms, or the rest of the terms, the memorandum is complete: see, for instance, Cave v. Hastings (2).

It has, however, been decided that, if the reference in the later writing be, not to a written agreement, but only to terms agreed by parol, there is no enforceable contract: see Ridgway v. Wharton (3). It is on this point that E the defendant relies. It is said on his behalf that when parol evidence is led to explain the references in the letter of July 1 to the words "mutually agreed terms" and "reached agreement on this matter," that evidence leads only to the conclusion of the oral agreement during the course of June 28 which I have described. It is said to be no part of this agreement that its terms were, in fact, recorded in Mr. Nicholas's note and that for this purpose I may not F look at that note, which does not purport of itself to be of a contractual nature. In this connection I have been referred to Long v. Millar (4). The plaintiff urges that that case justifies me in laying the two documents side by side and observing the connection between them. It is said that, if this be done, no oral evidence is necessary because that connection springs to the eye and G convinces the reader that the two refer to the same transaction. If this be legitimate, I agree with that submission. This way of finding a memorandum was urged on RUSSELL, J., in the well-known argument of Mr. Clauson in Stokes v. Whicher (5). As to that, the learned judge makes the following observations ([1920] 1 Ch. 419):

"Mr. Clauson has put his case on a higher platform and said that, even H if you do not get any reference, either inferential or otherwise, in the second, the defective, document to the first, the authorities go to show that if, placing the two documents side by side, there is, upon an inspection of them, such a physical state of affairs that it is obvious that they were produced at the same time and that they originally, to that extent, formed a single document, you can take them and read them together, even though one document does not by inference or in terms contain a reference to the other. There is some colour for that proposition in Oliver v. Hunting (6) before KEKEWICH, J., and more still in the later case before the Court of Appeal of Sheers v. Thimbleby & Son (7). However that may be, I do not propose to decide this case upon that broad ground, because I have come to the conclusion that, upon this document as it stands, I can find in it a sufficient reference to another document which contains the necessary terms."

I am here asked to do what RUSSELL, J., declined to do. On the whole, I do not think that Long v. Millar (4) goes so far, nor, in my judgment, does Oliver v. Hunting (6). In that case the missing element was the name of the property to be purchased, and KEKEWICH, J., found it in the receipt for the deposit, but the document to which that receipt pointed was, in fact, a written contract, or so the learned judge held. Moreover, he only professed to be following Long v. Millar (4) and Cave v. Hastings (2), both of which adhere to the rule of connecting documents by parol evidence where the one leads to the other, and that method does not carry the plaintiff home in this case.

More to the point is Sheers v. Thimbleby & Son (7). That was a decision of the Court of Appeal and LOPES, L.J., gave the leading judgment, which was a reserved judgment. The memorandum there consisted of two documents the later of which did not refer to the earlier, nor was parol evidence led to show that a reference in one of them led to the other. The learned lord justice says (76 L.T. 711):

"The one letter states: 'I hereby guarantee the safety of the investments, Burton's and Balderson's,' and the other acknowledges the receipt of the £710 invested by the plaintiff Sergeant with Burton and Balderson as follows: 'received from you the sum £710, as under: A mortgage on an estate at Toynton St. Peter, the property of Mr. James Burton, £360; a mortgage on an estate at Fiskney, the property of Mr. Balderson, £350.' I cannot myself doubt that these two documents on their face show that they are connected together without the aid of parol evidence. It might have been said in Long v. Millar (4) that the receipt signed by the defendant for the £31 as a deposit on the purchase of three plots at Hammersmith might refer to a different purchase to that referred to in the agreement to purchase; but this argument this court would not entertain, and, I think, quite rightly. So here it would, in my judgment, be sheer affectation to say that, without the aid of parol evidence, it cannot be predicated whether Burton's and Balderson's investments, in the letter of Sept. 15 referred to Burton's and Balderson's mortgages in that of Sept. 16, for, in my opinion, they clearly do, and formed part of, one and the same transaction. It does not seem to me that, the two documents having been written, one on one day and the other on the next, causes them to be such separate and distinct documents that the one cannot be connected with the other without the aid of parol evidence, for, in my judgment, it is not so."

If that judgment is right it justifies the process to which I am invited here. Now it seems to me that it is a very artificial doctrine which allows me to receive evidence as to the nature of the agreement referred to in the letter of July 1, 1949, but declines to allow me to look at the document recording that transaction when I find that, if I place the two documents side by side, I need no parol evidence at all to satisfy myself that the two refer to the one transaction. Thus Mr. Nicholas's memorandum speaks of "Sale of Beach Approach Holiday Camp" and "Agreed sum £10,500," while the letter is headed "Disposal of Beach Approach Holiday Camp" and asserts "we were able to mutually agree terms for the purchase of Beach Approach Holiday Camp." As the lord justice said in the last case cited, it would be sheer affectation to pretend that it is not obvious that the two documents refer to the same transaction. I think, therefore, I can go this far—that I am entitled to incorporate the defendant's signature on the letter of July 1 with Mr. Nicholas's note and thus get a memorandum complete in this respect.

There remains, however, another obstacle in the plaintiff's way. It is said that the two documents, if read together, still do not record all the terms of the contract, and are, therefore, no sufficient memorandum of it. The omitted terms are said to be, first, the exception of the electrical appliances and the property of the Office of Works already mentioned, and, secondly, the inclusion of the deposits. As to the first of these, I am of opinion that the contract was to sell all the vendor's interest in the camp and its equipment. He was careful to point out that these articles were excluded, and the defendant agreed that he did not suppose he was negotiating for them. They were, therefore, not included in the agreement and need not be mentioned in the memorandum. The deposits are another matter. They belonged to the vendor and were thrown in to sweeten the bargain, and, no doubt, were part of the inducement to the defendant to accept the extra £500 in the price. It was argued for the plaintiff that the deposits would pass under the contract without mention, and this might be so if the sale had been a sale of the business as a going concern with its assets and liabilities, but, as I have already held, that was not the bargain, and, in my judgment, the deposits required to be mentioned no less than the stock if they were to pass.

Lastly, it was argued that this was a term wholly for the defendant's benefit which the plaintiff may concede and so avoid the mischief of the statute, and North v. Loomes (8) was cited as supporting that view. That case is some authority for the proposition that a plaintiff may waive such a term and enforce the contract, but it does not extend to the converse case. It may be right that a defendant should not be allowed to avoid his bargain when the plaintiff is not insisting on a term detrimental to him, but that is not the same thing as to say that a plaintiff may enforce a bargain not set out in the memorandum by giving something to the defendant. I find in WILLIAMS ON VENDOR AND PURCHASER, 4th ed., p. 5, this statement:

"It appears, however, that if a stipulation, which is to the detriment or for the benefit of one of the parties exclusively, is omitted from the memorandum, that party may submit to perform it or waive the benefit of it (as the case may require), and may with such submission or waiver specifically enforce the contract as stated in the memorandum."

This statement does not appear in the second edition, and I do not think it finds support in the cases cited. I prefer the note in FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, 6th ed., p. 243, which is in these terms:

"It would seem, however, that where a stipulation of no great importance and solely benefiting the plaintiff is omitted from the memorandum, the defendant will not, in an action for specific performance, in which the stipulation is not asserted against him, be allowed to set up that the memorandum is insufficient by reason of such omission to satisfy the statute, if the plaintiff chooses to waive his stipulation."

In other words, if you are going to leave the term out altogether, it may be the plaintiff can enforce it. But here there is no intention of either party to leave it out, and the court is being asked to assert a term which is not in the memorandum at all, and, in my judgment, the principle in FRY does not extend to this. I hold, therefore, that the memorandum is deficient in this respect.

Two more questions were argued. First, that the plaintiff by re-selling the property had rescinded the contract, and, therefore, could not obtain damages for its breach, and, secondly, the measure of damages. As to the first, I hold that the defendant, by his solicitors' letter of July 23, which I have read, repudiated the contract. It was thus open to the plaintiff to accept this repudiation and sue in damages, and this, in my judgment, she did by her solicitors' letter of Oct. 22, 1949, which I have read. This is an unhappily worded document. It treats the contract as still on foot, but by threatening to re-sell it conditionally accepts the defendant's repudiation. It was open to him at that time to recant and to perform the bargain, but he did not do so, and, in my judgment, the plaintiff was not bound to give further warning, but was at liberty after a reasonable interval to treat the contract as at an end as she did by granting an option to a third party and issuing the writ. As to damages, it was agreed that the date at which they must be calculated was that of the defendant's breach or shortly thereafter, that is to say, in July or August, 1949. The plaintiff's counsel conceded that the evidence of value at that time did not show a diminution of more than £500 from the contract price. As the plaintiff is entitled to retain the deposit she could get no more. If, therefore, I had held the memorandum sufficient I should have awarded the plaintiff £500 and held that it was satisfied by the deposit already in her hands.

WIGLEY v. WIGLEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Birkett, L.JJ.), November 3, 6, 1950.]

Legal Aid—Security for costs—Right of assisted person to order—Matrimonial cause—Amount of order—Wife's case conducted by salaried solicitor—Wife poor person when application first made—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359), reg. 5 (10).

There is nothing in the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, which prevents an assisted person obtaining an order for security for costs. Regulation 5 (10) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, which relates to matrimonial causes, provides that where a wife is an assisted person and the maximum contribution payable by her is not more than £10 and it appears to the local committee that her husband cannot provide such security as would make up their joint contribution to £10, the wife's case is to be conducted by a salaried solicitor of the Law Society, but that regulation has not the effect of requiring that, if later the wife is given an order for security for costs, the amount should be limited to £10. In such circumstances it is open to the registrar to follow the general, accepted principles with regard to applications for security for costs and he is not bound by any earlier decision of a local committee.

[FOR THE LEGAL AID AND ADVICE ACT, 1949, s. 1 (7) and s. 12 (2) (b) (ii), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 18, p. 534 and p. 548, respectively.]

APPEAL by the wife from a decision of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated Oct. 5, 1950, refusing an application by her for an extension of time in which to appeal to the judge in chambers against an order of the registrar of the Southampton District Registry, dated July 26, 1950, refusing to make an order for security for costs in her favour in a suit in which her husband had petitioned for divorce on the ground of her adultery.

D. Henderson for the wife.

Broderick for the husband.

SINGLETON, L.J. : This is an appeal by the wife who is respondent in a matrimonial suit. On July 9, 1949, her husband petitioned for a divorce on the ground that she had committed adultery. On Nov. 24, 1949, an answer was filed by the wife in which she denied that she had committed adultery, and she cross-petitioned for a divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty. The co-respondent named in the husband's petition entered an appearance, but did not file an answer. Between the date of the petition and the date of the answer the wife obtained a certificate under which she was entitled to defend the petition as a poor person, and she was a poor person on Oct. 2, 1950, when the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, came into operation. From that date she is to be regarded as an assisted person under that Act.

On July 12, 1950, the case was set down for hearing. The solicitor assigned to the wife was a London solicitor, but interlocutory matters were dealt with in the Southampton district registry. On July 26 an application was made to the registrar at Southampton for security for the wife's costs by solicitors at Southampton. That application was refused. Counsel for the wife told the court that the registrar was informed that the husband had already paid £91 to former solicitors of the wife in respect of the costs or as security for the costs, and it was said that it was on that assumption that the registrar refused to make an order. Counsel said that the £91 was, in fact, paid to the wife in respect of quite different matters. The husband and wife had held assets jointly which had been sold for £182. That sum was divided equally, and in December, 1949, the wife received £91. The order made by the registrar was as follows: "Upon hearing the solicitors for the petitioner and the respondent and the respondent having received £91 from the petitioner on Dec. 2, 1949, it is ordered that there be no order for security for costs herein." On Aug. 16, 1950, the wife's solicitors applied ex parte to the registrar and pointed out to him that there was some misunderstanding regarding the £91. The registrar said the wife had the right of appeal to the judge in chambers, but the time for an appeal had then expired. On Sept. 1 the wife's solicitors in London, having received the file from Southampton, issued a summons for extension of time in which to appeal to the judge from the order of the registrar. On Oct. 5 the summons was heard before COLLINGWOOD, J., who held that the appeal was out of time and declined to extend the time. He did not go into the merits of the case otherwise than to consider whether he ought to extend the time or not, but he gave leave to appeal. In my view, the learned judge ought to have extended the time. There had been no waste of time on the part of the wife's solicitors. They had put the facts as they knew them before the registrar at Southampton in the first instance. They had caused their Southampton agent to go before the registrar again when the facts were established, and they had adopted the advice of the registrar in seeking leave to appeal although time had expired. In those circumstances I think that the time ought to have been extended so that the appeal could have been heard on its merits by COLLINGWOOD, J. As it is, we have had to consider this case without the advantage of knowing what view the learned judge took on the various sections of the new Act and the regulations made thereunder. It is always an advantage to this court to have the view of one of experience in the practice of the Divorce Court when it is considering a matter arising therefrom.

By r. 74 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947:

"Where an application for security has been made under this rule, the registrar or taxing officer shall ascertain what is a sufficient sum of money to cover the costs of the wife, and if, after taking all the circumstances into account, including the means of the husband and the wife, he considers that the husband should provide security for all or some of the wife's costs, he may order the husband to pay the sum so ascertained, or some portion of it, into court or to give security therefor within such time as he may fix, and may direct a stay of the proceedings until such order is complied with."

That rule stated what had been the practice in divorce for many years. That practice continued unaffected, except perhaps as to amount, when the poor person's procedure was established. Even if one party, or both parties, had been admitted as a poor person, or persons, an order could be made for security for the wife's costs. This present wife was admitted as a poor person, and her application for security for costs was made when she was a poor person. If she had continued under the Poor Persons' Rules the practice would have been the same as it had been for many years, but it is said that by the coming into operation of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the whole position is changed.

Counsel for the husband put forward three main submissions to this court. The first raised the question whether a wife who is an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in respect of whom the maximum contribution payable is not more than £10 is entitled to an order for security against her husband. The second submission was that, assuming that she could obtain an order for security, the order must be limited to the sum of £10 mentioned in reg. 5 (10) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, or, alternatively, that she ought not to be given a greater sum by way of security than she would have obtained if she had remained a poor person. The third submission was that in any event there ought to be no order in this case having regard to all the facts.

We have considered a good many sections of the Act and the regulations made under it, but I find nothing in the Act or in the regulations which forces me to say that the long-standing practice under which an order for security for the wife's costs has been made has been altered. Section 12 of the Act, which gives the Lord Chancellor power to make regulations, seems to point to the fact that the power to order security for costs remains. Section 12 (2) provides:

"Without prejudice to the foregoing sub-section or any other provision of this Act authorising the making of regulations, regulations may . . . (b) regulate the procedure of any court or tribunal in relation to legal aid, and in particular make provision . . . (ii) as to the cases in which and extent to which a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs, and the manner in which it may be given . . ."

Therefore, it seems to me that the first submission in opposition to this appeal fails.

The second submission is based on reg. 5 (10) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, which provides:

"Where an application relates to a matrimonial cause and the maximum contribution payable by the applicant is not more than £10, the local committee shall inform the applicant that if he accepts the terms upon which they are prepared to issue a certificate they will arrange for the case to be conducted, in accordance with s. 6 (7) of the Act, by a solicitor employed by the Law Society for a salary to act in connection with matrimonial causes: Provided that this paragraph shall not apply where the applicant is a wife and it appears to the local committee that the husband might reasonably be expected, if ordered to do so, to provide such security for her costs as would, with her contribution, if any, amount to more than £10."

That regulation, read with the proviso, presupposes a case in which the wife cannot provide £10 and the local committee comes to the conclusion that the husband cannot pay enough to render a joint contribution of £10 possible. In those circumstances there is the provision for a salaried solicitor employed by the Law Society to act for the wife. It is submitted that when that has been done no portion of the solicitor's costs can be recovered. Counsel for the wife argued that there are other costs and disbursements, and, consequently, there is no reason why there should not be an order for security for costs generally to cover those matters. Counsel for the husband replied that the proviso to reg. 5 (10) presupposes that together the two parties cannot provide more than £10, and, therefore, there ought not to be any greater security for costs ordered than the sum of £10. I do not think that reg. 5 (10) has the effect of imposing a requirement that, if a wife is given security for her costs, they shall be limited to £10. The proviso is:

"Provided that this paragraph shall not apply where the applicant is a wife and it appears to the local committee that the husband might reasonably be expected, if ordered to do so, to provide such security for her costs as would, with her contribution, if any, amount to more than £10."

The local committee is assumed to have considered that question and to have come to a decision, but they may not have had full information before them. If thereafter there is a summons before the registrar to ask for security of the wife's costs it is, I think, open to the registrar to consider all the facts, and, if it appears to him within the general principles, adopted and applied for so long, right to make an order for more than £10, it is open to him to do so. He is not bound by the limits arrived at by the local committee on such information as was before them when they considered the question at an earlier stage. I think it is probably right and just that when an appeal of this kind comes before the court in respect of an application which was made when the wife was a poor person, it would in general be right to limit the amount of her order to that which she would have obtained as a poor person.

[HIS LORDSHIP examined the evidence in support of the third submission for the husband, found that the registrar had considered all the circumstances, and said it was impossible to hold that the registrar was wrong in refusing to make an order for security. Accordingly, the appeal was dismissed.]

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree. There is no doubt that the wife, who was a poor person, by the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, became an assisted person: see s. 17 (3); so the case comes before us with the wife an assisted person and the husband not. In those circumstances counsel for the wife said: "I am entitled to come to this court to appeal against the judgment of COLLINGWOOD, J., on two matters. I appeal first of all on the ground that he was wrong in not extending the time." My Lord has already said that, in our view, the time ought to have been extended. Counsel for the wife also said: "I submit (a) that I am entitled to an order for security for costs, and (b) that I am not limited in any way in making that application by anything that appears either in the regulations or in the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949." The position of the wife was that her maximum contribution under the Act did not exceed £10. Her case was a matrimonial cause, and it was conducted by a solicitor employed by the Law Society in its Divorce Department. That meant that the fees were on a low scale which was specially fixed, but it is plain that where the assisted person is a wife and it appears that the husband might reasonably be expected and ordered to provide security for her costs in such an amount that with that sum her contribution would be more than £10, it would not be a case for the solicitor in the Law Society's Divorce Department, but would be one for the ordinary panel of solicitors assigned to all assisted persons. Counsel for the wife thereupon argued: "I am not bound, in my application for security, merely because I am in that position, to be limited to security to the amount of £10, but the discretion is in the court to deal with all the circumstances and to make the amount as they think fit." On the other hand, counsel for the husband said: "After the coming into force of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the whole basis of this matter changed," and he submitted that the theory on which the order for security for costs had formerly been made now no longer had any application. He argued that in some detail, and then said: "If I am wrong about that and it is open to an assisted person to get an order for security for costs, having regard to the special position of this wife (what I would call the under £10 position) security for costs against the husband must necessarily be limited to that amount, or, alternatively, such an amount as would have been payable under the Poor Persons' Rules if there had been no change." The rule is set out at p. 281 of RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 5th ed.:

"A wife suing as a 'poor person' or whose husband is so suing, can obtain an order for security for the out-of-pocket costs of the hearing . . ."

Counsel's third point was that, having regard to all the circumstances, no order should be made.

I do not think that counsel's first point will bear examination. It is expressly provided by s. 1 (7) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949:

"Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder—(a) the fact that the services of counsel or a solicitor are given by way of legal aid shall not affect the relationship between or rights of counsel, solicitor and client or any privilege arising out of such relationship; and (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised."

As my Lord has pointed out, s. 12 (2) (b) (ii) gives the Lord Chancellor power to make regulations as to the cases in which, and the extent to which, a person receiving legal aid may be required to give security for costs and the manner in which it may be given. I am of opinion that the new Act has done nothing to prevent an assisted person coming to the court at the proper time on appropriate occasions to ask for security for costs. I, therefore, agree with the view which my Lord has already expressed that the right of the present wife to come to ask for security for costs is not affected by the Act.

As to how that sum is to be assessed, I also agree with what my Lord has said. I think that the committee, when originally dealing with this matter and coming to the conclusion that a contribution should be asked only from the wife, must have considered that the husband himself was not able to make much of a contribution. Otherwise the case might have been dealt with differently. I cannot think that any registrar or any court called on to assess the amount for security is in any way rigidly confined because of that particular provision. Neither do I think that the sum under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is to be assessed merely as though the Poor Persons' Rules still existed. When a poor person becomes an assisted person under the Act of 1949 she must be dealt with under the provisions and regulations of that Act.

[HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence and the submission that no order should be made on the merits, found that the payment of £91 to the wife was a material circumstance to which the registrar had given effect and concluded:] In all the circumstances I think that we cannot disturb the order made by the registrar and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

A

Rent Restriction—Sub-tenancy—Exclusive use of part of house—Kitchen and other essential parts of house shared with tenant—Surrender of tenancy by tenant—Landlord's right to possession against sub-tenant—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 9.

B

A tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied sub-let a part of the house unfurnished, the sub-tenant having the use of the kitchen and other essential parts of the premises in common with the tenant. The tenant vacated the part occupied by her, and the landlord claimed possession of the other part from the sub-tenant.

HELD: section 9 of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was intended to protect the tenant against the landlord where the tenant had created a sub-tenancy under which certain parts of the premises were shared, but it was not intended to protect the sub-tenant under such a sub-tenancy against the landlord where the tenancy between the tenant and the landlord had been terminated, and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to possession.

APPEAL by the landlord from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE HARRISON, sitting at Southport County Court, dated July 25, 1950, whereby he refused the landlord an order for possession of part of a dwelling-house on the ground that the sub-tenant of that part was a protected tenant under the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, by virtue of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 9.

H

The sub-tenancy gave the sub-tenant the right to the sole occupation of certain rooms and the right to share other rooms, including the kitchen, with the tenant. After the tenant had vacated possession the landlord sought an order for possession against the sub-tenant on the ground that the sub-tenancy was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. The county court judge refused to make an order for possession and the landlord appealed. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

J. M. Davies for the landlord.

P. H. R. Bristow for the sub-tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal by the landlord against a decision of the county court judge refusing to make an order for possession. There is no dispute on the facts about any relevant matter. The landlord let the premises in question to a Mrs. Wilde. He served a notice to quit on her in 1948, and at about the same time she agreed with the sub-tenant, Mr. Greenhalgh, that he should have exclusive occupation of some rooms, but that essential parts of the premises, including the kitchen, should be shared. The sharing between Mrs. Wilde and the sub-tenant and his wife went on until Feb. 16, 1950, when Mrs. Wilde herself ceased to occupy the premises. The landlord then sought possession from the sub-tenant who claimed that he was entitled to stay on.

Before referring to the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, it is useful to consider the position on the authorities as it was before that date with regard to this question of sharing. In Neale v. Del Soto (1), the tenant was let two unfurnished rooms with the use jointly with the landlord of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coal-house, and conservatory. It was held that that amounted to a sharing of the house although each party had exclusive use of some rooms and that the letting was not a letting of a separate dwelling-house within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. Therefore, in such circumstances, as between the tenant and his landlord, the protection of the Acts could not be claimed by the tenant. That principle was extended in Banks v. Cope Brown (2), to a case where the landlord was not one of the sharers, but had let the premises to two or more tenants, each tenant having some rooms of which he had exclusive possession, and sharing other essential rooms with the other tenant. In Turner v. Baker (3) this court decided that a tenant who had sub-let a furnished bed-sitting room with the use of the kitchen in common with herself lost the protection of the Acts so that the landlord was entitled to possession. That decision was reversed by the House of Lords who held that, even if the sub-tenant had no separate dwelling-house, the house was still let to the tenant as a separate dwelling, and, therefore, the landlord was not entitled to possession of the whole house. Previously, in Kenyon v. Walker, Stevenson v. Kenyon (4) it had been decided that a sub-tenant who had a sharing tenancy was not protected. There is one other case which I do not think really comes into the present argument, but I will refer to it. In Barrell v. Fordree (5), a tenant had created furnished sub-tenancies of two separate parts of the house, retaining a third part for herself. The House of Lords decided that, although the tenant was entitled to claim protection in respect of the rooms which she occupied, the landlord was entitled to possession of those which had been sub-let furnished.

That was the state of the law when the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was passed. Section 7 of that Act deals with the position as between tenant and immediate landlord, and provides:

“Where under any contract—(a) a tenant has the exclusive occupation of any accommodation, (b) the terms on which he holds the accommodation include the use of other accommodation in common with his landlord or with his landlord and other persons, and (c) by reason only of the circumstances mentioned in para. (b) of this section, the accommodation referred to in para. (a) thereof is not a dwelling-house to which the [Rent Restrictions] Acts apply, the [Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946], shall apply to the contract notwithstanding that the rent does not include payment for the use of furniture or for services.”

The Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, set up tribunals to deal with furnished lettings which are not controlled under the Rent Restrictions Acts, but are to some extent controlled under the Act of 1946. An application can be made for a reduction of rent, and the tribunal has power to protect a tenant if, after reference to a tribunal, the landlord gives him notice to quit. It is to be noticed that the legislature did not give the sharing tenant the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. It gave him the lesser protection of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946. It seems to me plain that that was the position of the sub-tenant during the period of Mrs. Wilde's tenancy, and, in my opinion, it would need very plain words to lead to the conclusion that the position of the sub-tenant was improved as the result of the tenant from whom he derived his interest giving up her interest altogether. That would seem to me an illogical result.

A Section 9 of the Act of 1949 is the one on which counsel for the sub-tenant relies and I will read the relevant parts of it:

B “Where the tenant of any premises, being a house or part of a house, has sub-let a part, but not the whole, of the premises, then as against his landlord or any superior landlord (but without prejudice to the rights against and liabilities to each other of the tenant and any person claiming under him, or of any two such persons) no part of the premises shall be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the [Rent Restrictions] Acts apply by reason only—(a) that the terms on which any person claiming under the tenant holds any part of the premises include the use of accommodation in common with other persons . . .”

C There follows a reference to a furnished letting. That section, in my view, is dealing with the position as between a landlord and a tenant who has himself made a sharing sub-tenancy or has sub-let part of the premises furnished. It is saying that, as between the landlord and the tenant, no part of the premises is to be treated as not being a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts apply.

D All are concerned with in the present case is to consider whether s. 9 contains any such express words as would produce the result about which it is necessary for the sub-tenant to satisfy us, namely, that the sub-tenant, who would not have had the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts if Mrs. Wilde had remained, now has it. I can find no such express words in this section. Indeed, the words “without prejudice . . .” seem to me expressly to point in a contrary direction. As questions may arise under this section I do not propose to set out exactly what seem to me to be its precise limits. For the reasons I have given I think this appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree. The sections are not entirely easy to follow, but, in my judgment, on the facts of this case it is plain that the appeal should succeed. Section 7 of the Act of 1949 relates to the decision in Neale v. Del

F Soto (1) where part of a dwelling-house was let, the tenant sharing other essential parts of the house with the landlord. In such a case s. 7 does not say that the Rent Restrictions Acts shall apply notwithstanding the sharing arrangement; it recognises that, owing to the sharing arrangement, as between landlord and tenant the accommodation is not a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply. That being placed on record, the section provides that the Furnished
G Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, shall apply to the contract. If the sub-tenant's submission in the present case were accepted, the curious result would be that after s. 7 has recognised that the sharing by the tenant with the landlord of essential rooms in the house prevents the premises from being a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts apply, nevertheless s. 9 provides that in this type of case those Acts are to apply. That would be a result so surprising
H that it would require clear words to produce it.

So far as s. 9 is concerned, I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that it is primarily intended to protect the tenant and his sub-tenant as against the tenant's landlord where there have been sub-lettings, which, considered by themselves, would not have been protected sub-lettings, that is to say, the tenant is given a reasonably free hand to deal with the premises as he thinks fit and he does not jeopardise his position or forfeit his rights under the Act merely because he lets some part of the premises furnished or under a sharing agreement.

In my judgment, however, it by no means follows, where the tenant quits, leaving a sub-tenant in possession of part of the premises with a right to share some other part, that that sub-tenant is still protected as against the former tenant's landlord. I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that there is nothing in the section which constrains the court to place that meaning on it, and I agree that it cannot be intended in a case like the present, after the tenant has vacated the premises and given up the tenancy and the tenant's landlord has stepped into the tenant's shoes as the immediate landlord of the sub-tenant, to put the sub-tenant in a better position as against the landlord than he was in under his contract with the tenant. The county court judge said: "In my view, if the whole purpose of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, was to protect the head tenant and not to protect the sub-tenant as against the landlord, then the distinctions between s. 7 and s. 9 of that Act become entirely ridiculous." With respect to the judge I do not agree. An obvious distinction is drawn in s. 9 between the position as between the tenant and the landlord and the position as between the tenant and the sub-tenant. The protection is in the former relationship and not in the latter. By the words in parenthesis in s. 9:

"... but without prejudice to the rights against and liabilities to each other of the tenant and any person claiming under him, or of any two such persons..."

those rights are expressly saved. For the reasons given by SOMERVELL, L.J., and such additional reasons as I have given, I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

MAGOR AND ST. MELLONS RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. NEWPORT CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), November 3, 27, 1950.]

Local Government—Alteration of areas—Extension of county borough boundaries to include parts of rural districts—Loss to rural district ratepayers—Abolition of rural district councils affected and districts amalgamated—Right of new rural district council to financial adjustment with county borough—"Property" of former rural district councils—Local Government Act, 1933 (c. 51), sched. V, r. 1 (a).

By the Newport Extension Act, 1934, s. 4, the boundary of the county borough of Newport was extended so as to include part of the area of the rural district of Magor and part of the area of the rural district of St. Mellons. The Act came into force on Apr. 1, 1935. By the Local Govern-

A ment Act, 1933, s. 151 and s. 152 (which are applied by s. 58 of the Act of 1934 where financial adjustments are necessary under the latter Act), provision is made for the adjustment of property, income, etc., between public bodies affected by any alteration in areas. Section 151 (1) enables public bodies so affected to settle any such adjustments by agreement. Section 152 (1) (b) provides that provision should (on an adjustment under s. 151) be made for payment to a local authority of such sum as might seem equitable in accordance with the rules contained in sched. V to the Act of 1933 in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries, would properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of that local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of any of its functions. Rule 1 of sched. V provides that in determining the sum to be paid: "Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue." Before the Act of 1934 came into force the Minister of Health made the County of Monmouth Review Order, 1935, which came into force on the same day as, but immediately after, the Act of 1934. The Order abolished the rural district of Magor and the rural district of St. Mellons and formed a new rural district of Magor and St. Mellons, which included all the areas forming the two former rural districts except such parts thereof as were transferred to the borough of Newport by the Act of 1934 or to the areas of other authorities by the Order. Under art. 53 of the Order all property and liabilities of the dissolved district councils of Magor and St. Mellons were transferred to and vested in the new rural district council. "Property" in art. 53 bore the same meaning as in the Local Government Act, 1888, which, in s. 100, defines it as including all property, real and personal, and all estates, interests, easements and rights, whether equitable or legal, in, to, and out of property real and personal including things in action. The new rural district council of Magor and St. Mellons made a claim to the Newport Corporation for financial adjustment under the Act of 1934. It was accepted that, but for the Order of 1935, the separate rural district councils for Magor and St. Mellons would each have been entitled to an adjustment under s. 151 of the Act of 1933.

HELD: (i) the right to financial adjustment was "property" within the meaning of s. 100 of the Act of 1888, and, therefore, that right passed from the two former rural district councils to the new rural district council of Magor and St. Mellons by virtue of the Order of 1935, but

G (ii) (DENNING, L.J., dissentiente) the new rural district council could claim only as assignee of the two former councils; the increase of burden on the two former councils endured only for a moment, since the Order of 1935 dissolved them immediately after the alteration of boundaries occurred; and, therefore, the payment to which the two former councils became entitled was nil and the amount of the claim of the new council was also nil.

PARKER, J., held that the rural district council (as the successor to two rural district councils which had been abolished) was entitled to any right against Newport Corporation to which the two former councils had been entitled, but that, in the circumstances, the rights of those councils in respect of a transfer of burden consequent on an alteration in boundaries had been of no money value*.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 27. The following judgments were read.

COHEN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment given on Oct. 5, 1950, by PARKER, J., on a consultative Case stated by Mr. MICHAEL ROWE who was acting as arbitrator in a dispute between the rural district council of Magor and St. Mellons (hereinafter called the new rural district council) and the mayor, aldermen and burgesses of the county borough of Newport (hereinafter called the borough council). This dispute arose out of an alteration of boundaries which had been made in manner following.

By the Newport Extension Act, 1934, s. 4, the boundary of the county borough of Newport was enlarged so as to include part of the area of the rural district of Magor and part of the area of the rural district of St. Mellons. The parts so added to the borough of Newport were in the said Act and are hereinafter referred to as "the added areas." The Act of 1934 came into force on Apr. 1, 1935 (in the Act of 1934 and hereinafter referred to as "the appointed day"). Section 58 of the Act of 1934 provided that where in consequence of the Act of 1934 any adjustment of any property, income, debts, liabilities or expenses or of any financial relations might be required, an adjustment should be made between the councils or other authorities affected under and in accordance with s. 151 and s. 152 of the Local Government Act, 1933 (hereinafter referred to as the Act of 1933) as if the Act of 1934 were an Order made under Part VI of the Act of 1933.

Section 151 of the Act of 1933 enables any public bodies affected by any alteration of areas or authorities made by an Order under Part VI of the Act of 1933 to settle any requisite adjustments of property, income, etc., by agreement. The section further provides that in default of agreement as to any matter requiring adjustment, such adjustment shall be referred to arbitration. Section 152 (1) (b) provides that on an adjustment under s. 151 provision should, unless otherwise agreed, be made for the payment to a local authority of such sum as might seem equitable in accordance with the rules contained in sched. V to the Act of 1933 in respect of any increase of burden which, as a consequence of any alteration of boundaries or other change in relation to which the adjustment takes place, would properly be thrown on the ratepayers of the area of that local authority in meeting the cost incurred by that local authority in the discharge of any of their functions. Schedule V to the Act of 1933 laid down certain rules for determining the sum to be paid in respect of increase of burden on ratepayers. Rule 1, omitting the proviso which does not affect the question before us, reads as follows:

- A “Regard shall be had to—(a) the difference between the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place; (b) the length of time during which the increase of burden may be expected to continue.”
- C Rule 2 fixes a maximum which the sum payable in respect of the increase of burden is not to exceed.

Had the matter stopped at the Act of 1934 there can be no doubt but that the rural district of Magor and the rural district of St. Mellons would each have been entitled to an adjustment under s. 151 and that on that adjustment provision would have had to be made for the payment to each such rural district of an equitable sum under s. 152. But before the appointed day the Minister of Health, in exercise of the powers given to him by the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 46, made the County of Monmouth Review Order, 1935 (hereinafter referred to as “the Order”), which came into operation on the appointed day but immediately after the Act of 1934. The Order abolished the rural district of Magor and the rural district of St. Mellons and formed a new rural district to be known as the rural district of Magor and St. Mellons (hereinafter referred to as the new rural district). The new rural district included all the areas forming part (a) of the former rural district of Magor and (b) of the former rural district of St. Mellons except such parts thereof as were by the Act of 1934 transferred to the borough of Newport or were by the Order transferred to the areas of other authorities. Under art. 53 of the Order all property and liabilities of the dissolved district council of Magor and the dissolved district council of St. Mellons were transferred to and vested in or attached to the new rural district council, subject to a proviso which does not affect the point we have to decide. “Property” in art. 53 bears the same meaning as in the Local Government Act, 1888, which in s. 100 defines it as including all property, real and personal, and all estates, interests, easements, and rights, whether equitable or legal, in, to, and out of property real and personal, including things in action.

In July, 1942, the new rural district council delivered to the borough council a detailed claim to a financial adjustment under the Act of 1934 and the applied provisions of the Act of 1933. The parties were unable to agree as to the validity of the claim, and on Nov. 17, 1948, referred their dispute to the arbitration of Mr. ROWE. The parties asked the arbitrator to state a Case for the opinion of the court under the Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 9. On May 18, 1949, the arbitrator complied with this request, stating the questions for the opinion of the court as follows:

- H “(i) Whether the rural council as successor of the former rural district councils or otherwise is entitled to claim as against the borough council a financial adjustment under s. 58 (1) of the Act of 1934 and the applied provisions of the Act of 1933 in respect of the alteration of boundaries effected by the Act of 1934. (ii) If the first question is answered affirmatively, whether a claim for any increase of burden within the meaning of s. 152 of the Act of 1933 can lawfully be made by the rural council. (iii) If the first and second questions are answered affirmatively whether, for the purpose of determining in this case the sum to be paid in respect of the increase of burden in accordance with the rules in sched. V to the Act of 1933, (a) the expression in para. 1 (a) of the schedule, 'the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the local authority in meeting the cost of executing any of their functions,' means the burden on the ratepayers which will properly be incurred by the rural council after the appointed day, or the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the councils of the two former rural districts if the Order had not been made, and (b) whether the expression in para. 1 (a) of the schedule 'the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the local authority in meeting such cost had no alteration of boundaries or other change taken place' means the estimated burden on the ratepayers which would have been incurred by an authority whose area consisted of the two former rural districts including the added areas, or the separately computed burdens on the ratepayers of each of the former rural districts which would have been incurred by each of the two former rural district councils had the Act of 1934 not been passed; or if none of the meanings attributed to those expressions in para. (a) and para. (b) hereof is correct, what is the true meaning of those expressions for the purpose of this case."

On Oct. 5, 1950, PARKER, J., answered the first question in the affirmative, but the second question in the negative. Accordingly, he did not find it necessary to deal with the third question. From this decision both parties appealed.

It will be convenient, first, to deal with the cross-appeal against the answer to the first question. The correctness of this answer depends on whether or not the right to a financial adjustment is "property" which passed to the new rural district council by virtue of art. 53 of the Order. The argument for the borough council is conveniently stated by the learned judge when rejecting it:

"The respondents, on the other hand, contend that such a right is not 'property' within the meaning of that article and that such a right did not, accordingly, vest in the claimant. It seems to me that any right to a financial adjustment in respect of physical property transferred to the respondents, e.g., council houses, administrative offices, etc., would clearly be a 'thing in action,' and, therefore, property which would vest in the claimant. Indeed, I think that, despite their contention in para. 15 (2) of the Case, the respondents would not dispute this, but they contend that, in so far as concerns the right to claim a financial adjustment in respect of increase of burden, that is a mere right to ask an arbitrator to say what is equitable within certain limits: per SCRUTTON, L.J., in Godstone Rural District Council v. Croydon Corporation (1) (102 L.J.K.B. 38); and, further that the words 'including things in action' in the definition of 'property' in s. 100 of the Act of 1888 must be read restrictively with the preceding words 'all estates, interests, easements and rights, whether equitable or legal, in, to, and out of property real and personal.' As regards this latter contention, all I need say is that I see no need to read the words in that restrictive sense. As regards the former contention, it seems to me that, once it is accepted that a right to a financial adjustment in some respects is property, that must include a right to claim an adjustment in respect of increase in burden. Section 152 (1) of the Act of 1933 stipulates that on an adjustment, provision shall, unless otherwise agreed, be made for a payment in respect of increase in burden."

A I agree so entirely with the reasoning and conclusion of the learned judge that I do not desire to add any further reasons of my own for concurring in his answer to question (i). He also referred to the decision in Dawson v. Great Northern & City Ry. Co. (2). The point decided in that case was a different one from that with which we are concerned, but I agree with him that there is a similarity between the two cases and that the payment under a financial adjustment may be regarded as in the nature of the price payable for the transfer of the added areas.

B I turn to the second question. As the learned judge pointed out, if his answer to the first question is correct, the new rural district could theoretically claim any adjustment in respect of increase in financial burden to which the old councils would have been entitled, but the learned judge answered the second question in the negative because he considered himself bound by the decision in Godstone Rural District Council v. Croydon Corpn. (1) to hold that he must have regard only to the increase in burden during the period of the continued existence of the old councils after the transfer of the added areas to the borough council. That period was but a moment of time, and, therefore, said PARKER, J., the sum ascertained in accordance with the rules laid down in sched. V must be nil. Counsel for the rural district council submitted that the Godstone case (1) did not necessarily lead to the learned judge's conclusion in the present case. In the Godstone case (1) the claimant was the authority, D part of whose areas had been transferred to the borough of Croydon. Before the matter came before the arbitrator the liability in respect of roads had been transferred by the Local Government Act, 1929, from rural district councils to county councils, and this court held that, having regard to r. 1 (b) of sched. V, the claimant could not recover in respect of the liability for road repair for any period after it had ceased to be responsible for the upkeep of roads. E SCRUTTON, L.J., however, expressly reserved the question whether the county council to whom the liability for road repair had been transferred might have a claim.

The question so reserved arose for decision in Oxford City Council v. Oxfordshire County Council (3), where their lordships reversed the decision of the F Court of Appeal, expressing their approval of the ratio decidendi of the dissenting judge, BENNETT, J.: see ([1938] 1 All E.R. 812). In the Oxford case (3), alterations of the boundaries as between the county of Oxford and the city of Oxford had been effected by the Oxford Extension Act, 1928, which came into operation on Apr. 1, 1929. On Apr. 1, 1930 (before claims for financial adjustment consequent on the Oxford Extension Act, 1928, had been disposed of) the G Local Government Act, 1929, came into force which transferred to the county council (a) from rural district councils, responsibility for the maintenance of district roads (by s. 30 (1)), and (b) from boards of guardians, responsibility for public assistance (by s. 1). Claims were then made against the city both by the county of Oxford and by certain district councils. The nature of and history of the claims is conveniently stated by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in the House of Lords as follows ([1938] 4 All E.R. 723):

H "Claims for financial adjustment were made upon the appellants by the two rural district councils in respect of the estimated increases of annual burden on the ratepayers of their respective areas in regard to the maintenance of highways. These were settled on the basis that, owing to the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1929, the burden (and therefore the increase) could have existed for one year only a sum of £1,925 being paid to Headington and a sum of £650 being paid to Woodstock. Claims for financial adjustment were also made by the respondents against the appellants, who agreed to pay and paid a sum of £195,000 in full settlement of all the respondents' financial claims arising out of alteration of areas, other than such claims (if any) as the respondents might be entitled to make for increase of burden as from Apr. 1, 1930, in respect of the maintenance of the roads transferred to them from the two district councils by the Local Government Act, 1929, and in respect of the administration of public assistance. Subsequently the respondents sent in two alternative claims against the appellants in respect of each of these matters. The appellants refused to admit any of the four claims, and Sir LYNDEN MACASSEY was appointed by the parties to arbitrate between them. By agreement he stated a consultative Case for the decision of the court. In para. 2 of the Special Case he states the four claims, the two alternative claims in respect of increase of burden on county ratepayers in meeting the cost of road maintenance being set out under heads (A) and (B) respectively, and the two alternative claims in respect of increase of burden on county ratepayers in meeting the cost of public assistance being set out under heads (C) and (D) respectively."

Heads (A) and (B) were as follows:

"(A) The difference (if any) between the burden on the ratepayers of the county which would properly be incurred by the county council in meeting the cost of executing their powers and duties in respect of roads transferred to them by the Local Government Act, 1929, and the burden on the ratepayers which would properly have been incurred by the county council in meeting such cost had the alteration of boundaries made by the Oxford Extension Act, 1928, not taken place; (B) Or, alternatively, the increase of burden, if any, which would have been thrown upon the ratepayers lately in the rural districts of Headington and Woodstock after Apr. 1, 1930, by reason of the said extension and for which the rural district councils would have obtained compensation if their functions as highway authorities had not been transferred to the county council under the Act of 1929."

In the Court of Appeal, GREER, L.J., and MACKINNON, L.J., answered the question in favour of the county council, GREER, L.J., on the basis of heads (A) and (C), and MACKINNON, L.J., on the basis of an approximation to heads (B) and (D); see per LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN (ibid., 724); but BENNETT, J., whose judgment was approved in the House of Lords, was in favour of the city council. His ratio decidendi on the question of public assistance is as follows ([1938] 1 All E.R. 816):

"The claim made by the claimants in respect of public assistance is formulated in s. 17 (B) of para. 1 of the Special Case and is in no way related to the claim the Woodstock board of guardians had or might have had against the Headington board of guardians. It is not a claim on behalf or in right of the ratepayers in the Woodstock union or on behalf or in right of the Woodstock board of guardians. It is a claim on behalf of the ratepayers throughout the administrative county of Oxford in relief of the burden upon them in respect of the cost of public assistance not in the old Woodstock union but throughout the administrative county of Oxford. It is a claim for an adjustment not in respect of an increase to a burden resting on Apr. 1, 1930, on the county ratepayers but in respect of a new burden placed upon such ratepayers for the first time on Apr. 1, 1930, by the Local Government Act, 1929. The crux of the matter is whether the language of s. 1 of the Local Government (Adjustments) Act, 1913, can be fitted to the facts out of which the present claim arises. The language of that section seems to me to envisage, first, a local authority exercising powers and duties in some given area, secondly, a change of boundaries effecting a transfer of a profitable part of the district of that local authority to another, and, lastly, as a consequence, an increased rate being levied upon the ratepayers in the reduced area of that local authority to enable it to exercise the same powers and duties in the reduced area. The language does not fit the case where after a change of boundaries has become an accomplished fact Parliament for the first time lays upon a local authority a new duty and upon the ratepayers of that authority a new burden to enable the local authority to discharge the new duty. Such a burden is not an increase to an existing burden as a consequence of change of boundaries. So to hold would, as it seems to me, enable adjustments to be made at any time if Parliament established a new public service, for example, hospitals for the sick, and laid the duty of performing it upon county councils and county boroughs and the burden of paying the cost of it upon the ratepayers of those authorities. For these reasons, I would myself answer question (C) in para. 2 of the special case in the negative. The same process of reasoning would lead me to answer question (A) of the same paragraph in the same sense."

It will be observed that the Woodstock Board of Guardians and the Headington Board of Guardians corresponded to the Magor Rural District Council and the St. Mellons Rural District Council in the present case. BENNETT, J., deals with the road portion of the claim, saying (ibid., 817):

"By virtue of the provisions of the Local Government Act, 1929, on Apr. 1, 1930, the said rural district councils and all other rural district councils in the administrative county of Oxford ceased to be road authorities and the roads which theretofore had been maintained by rural district councils became maintainable by the claimants. Just as in the case of their claim in respect of public assistance, so in the case of their claim in respect of road maintenance, the claimants' claim formulated in s. 17 of para. 1 of the Special Case has no relation to the claims of the Headington rural district council or the Woodstock rural district council, nor to any increase in burden upon their respective ratepayers."

The effect of his judgment is conveniently summarised by LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN in the House of Lords where he says ([1938] 4 All E.R. 725):

"I agree with [BENNETT, J.,] that the words of the section do not apply to a case (such as the present) where, subsequently to an accomplished change of boundaries, a new duty is laid upon a local authority, and a new burden is laid on the ratepayers of that authority to enable the local authority to discharge the new duty. In such a case there is no increase of an existing (or indeed any) burden as a consequence of an alteration of boundaries."

Counsel for the rural district council pointed out that in the Oxford case (3) the courts had not to consider the question whether the county council could claim as successor in title of the rural district council and boards of guardians. No argument on these lines appears to have been addressed to the court. Indeed, I doubt whether the facts would have permitted it, for, although the Act of 1929 contained a provision (s. 117) that road property and liabilities of a rural district council should be transferred to and vest in the county council, I do not think that section can have covered a claim in respect of increase of burden since the rural district councils remained in existence and had claims enforceable in their own right and for their own benefit in respect of the period before Apr. 1, 1930. Counsel for the borough council suggested that the question was raised by the form of heads (B) and (D) of the question before the court, and that BENNETT, J., dealt with it at the end of his judgment where he said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 817):

"The alternative questions propounded in para. II. (B) and (D) seem to me to be based upon the idea of subrogating the claimants to the rights the Headington and Woodstock rural district councils might have had against the respondents, and to the right the Woodstock guardians might have had against the Headington guardians if the Local Government Act, 1929, had not been passed."

I do not think, however, we can safely proceed on the basis that there is a decision binding us since the question does not appear to have been argued. Subrogation is something different from assignment and the language of the statute then under consideration did not, I think, afford a solid foundation for an argument based on assignment.

Treating the point as still open, I turn to the arguments that were addressed to us. Counsel for the borough council relied on a passage in LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN's speech in the Oxford case (3), where he said ([1938] 4 All E.R. 725):

"I would only add that in my opinion s. 1 (1) (b) of the Act of 1913 postulates by its language the existence of two burdens (a smaller burden and a larger burden) each of which is thrown on the ratepayers of the area of one and the same authority in meeting the cost incurred by that authority in executing any of its powers and duties, the burden becoming larger as a consequence of an alteration of the authority's boundaries; that is to say it postulates an authority imposing a burden on the ratepayers of its unreduced area, and the same authority subsequently imposing a larger burden on the ratepayers of its reduced area."

In the present case, he said, that postulate cannot exist since the authority which imposed the smaller burden had ceased to exist before the question of imposing a larger burden arose. Counsel for the rural district council, however, says that this is not conclusive because LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN's attention was not directed to the question of an assignee of the rights of the original authority. It would defeat, said counsel, the clear purpose of the Act if the authority taking over the beneficial area were not to remain liable despite an amalgamation of areas. The clear purpose of the Act was the benefit or relief of ratepayers by counteracting the increase of rates that might otherwise be imposed on them.

I do not, however, think this argument can avail the new rural district council. It can only claim as assignee of the old councils, for if it sought to claim in its own right the answer would be that the burden was imposed not by the Act of 1934, but by the Order, just as in the Oxford case (3) the burden in respect of roads was imposed, not by the Oxford Extension Act, 1928, but by the Local Government Act, 1929. If it claims as assignee, it cannot have greater rights than the dissolved rural district councils through whom it claims. The claim of the dissolved rural district councils would have had to be valued by an arbitrator in accordance with s. 152 and sched. V to the Act of 1933. The arbitrator would have had to have regard to the facts known at the time of the arbitration, and, in the result, the award would have necessarily been nil in view of the decision in the Godstone case (1). I think, therefore, that, although the decision in the Godstone case (1) is not directly in point, the learned judge was right when he held that it was implicit in that decision that the second question must be answered in the negative. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The Special Case sets out the various statutory provisions which the arbitrator had to interpret. They have been drafted, as legal documents often are, more with a view to accuracy than to intelligibility, and the unfortunate result is that the arbitrator has to ask the court what they mean. The learned judge has given one answer. The Court of Appeal has veered between one answer and another and is eventually divided in opinion.

A We all have to do the best we can to make sense of these provisions.

I confess that I find it difficult to deal with these questions of interpretation in the abstract. I like to see their practical application, and for that reason I propose to set out hypothetical sets of facts which, I suppose, are probably the true facts although they are not stated in the Case. Newport, Monmouthshire, is a very progressive borough. By 1935 it had expanded beyond its

B original boundaries into the adjoining rural districts. This had proved very helpful to the original ratepayers of those rural districts, because the new residents brought more money in to the rates than it cost the rural district councils to look after them. The new rich grounds, in effect, helped pay for the old poor grounds in the rural districts. But the time came in 1934 when the borough of Newport obtained an Act of Parliament extending its boundaries

C so as to take these rich grounds into the borough and out of the rural districts. This meant, of course, that, if nothing was done about it, the rates in the rural districts would have to go up, because they would be left with the poor grounds and with no help from the rich grounds which they had lost. To remedy this hardship on the ratepayers in the rural districts, Parliament expressly enacted that the borough of Newport should pay compensation to the rural district

D councils. The amount was to be agreed between them, or if not agreed was to be decided by an arbitrator. Parliament laid down rules to guide him. He was to have regard to the increase in rates which would fall on the ratepayers of the rural districts because they had lost the rich grounds and to the length of time their rates would have to be increased on that account.

That is all intelligible enough. The new boundaries were to take effect on

E Apr. 1, 1935, and, if the matter had been left where Parliament left it, the arbitrator would probably have solved all his difficulties and awarded the appropriate compensation without consulting the court about it, but the trouble has arisen because in 1935 the Minister of Health made an Order on the top of the Act of 1934. He made an Order combining two of the rural districts, shorn as each was of its rich grounds, and made them one district,

F and he said that this combination was to take place also on Apr. 1, 1935, but immediately after they had lost their rich grounds to the borough. No one would suppose that this innocent combination would take away from the ratepayers of the rural districts the right to compensation which Parliament had given them, but the judge has held that it has. If he is right, it means that the rural ratepayers have to bear all the increased burden themselves,

G without any help from the borough, and the borough gets off scot free by reason of a ministerial Order with which it had no concern.

I cannot think that the judge is right about this. The Minister's Order expressly provided that the property of the two rural district councils should be transferred to and vest in the combined council. The right of the two councils to compensation was clearly "property" which vested in the combined

H council, and the judge so held, but he thought that the right was worth nothing because the two councils only lived for a moment of time after they had been shorn of their rich grounds. Much as I respect his opinions, I cannot agree with him about this. The effect of the Minister's Order was, if I may use a metaphor, not the death of the two councils, but their marriage. The burdens which each set of ratepayers had previously borne separately became a combined burden to be borne by them all together. So, also, the rights to which the two councils would have been entitled for each set of ratepayers separately became a combined right to which the combined council was entitled for them all together. This was so obviously the intention of the Minister's Order that I have no patience with an ultra-legalistic interpretation which would deprive them of their rights altogether. I would repeat what I said in Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. v. Asher (4). We do not sit here to pull the language of Parliament and of Ministers to pieces and make nonsense of it. That is an easy thing to do, and it is a thing to which lawyers are too often prone. We sit here to find out the intention of Parliament and of Ministers and carry it out, and we do this better by filling in the gaps and making sense of the enactment than by opening it up to destructive analysis.

It may be said that these heroics are out of place, and I agree they are, because I think that Parliament has really made its intention plain enough. The Act which conferred the title to compensation conferred it on each of the district councils, not in its own right, but in right of its ratepayers: see s. 152 (1) (b) of the Act of 1933. The district council was the hand to receive the compensation, but it only received it so that it might give relief to the ratepayers for the increased burden which the change of boundaries cast on them. The amalgamation changed the legal identity of the two district councils, but it did not change the ratepayers at all, nor did it relieve them of their burdens: and there is no reason whatever why the amalgamated council should not claim the compensation due to the ratepayers. This enables me to show what I believe is the fallacy in the judgment of the learned judge. These are the steps in his argument. (i) Each district council only remained in existence for a moment of time after it was shorn of its rich grounds. (ii) Therefore, its increased burdens were to all intents and purposes nil. (iii) Therefore, it is entitled to nothing. (iv) The amalgamated council only takes over the property of the two district councils. (v) Therefore, as each of them was entitled to nothing, the amalgamated council is entitled to nothing. The fallacy in the whole of that argument is at the second step. It assumes that each district council was entitled in its own right in respect of its own increased burdens. On that basis it would, of course, be entitled to nothing because it did not live long enough to bear any increased burden itself. The answer is, however, that it was never entitled in its own right at all. It was only entitled in right of its ratepayers in respect of their increased burdens, and their increased burdens did not last only for a moment of time. They lasted for years. Parliament expressly said that the arbitrator was to have regard to the length of time during which the increase of burden on the ratepayers might be expected to continue: see r. 1 (a) and (b) of sched. V to the Act of 1933; whereas the judge has limited the arbitrator to the length of time during which the rural district councils might be expected to continue, to wit, only a moment of time. The answer is that the right of each district council, even during that one moment, was a right to compensation for the whole length of time in the future during which the increased burden might be expected to fall on the ratepayers, and it was that right which devolved on the amalgamated council. In my judgment, therefore, amalgamation does not destroy the rights of those ratepayers whose councils are amalgamated. It only transfers them to the amalgamated body.

So much for the main point in the case. But there still remains the question: How is the compensation to be assessed? Is it to be assessed as if the rural district councils had never been amalgamated, or is regard to be had to the fact that they have been amalgamated? There is a decision of this court which helps us here. In the Godstone case (1) it was decided that if a subsequent event lessened the burden on the ratepayers, it should be taken into account in assessing the compensation. It follows, therefore, that if the amalgamation lessens the burden on the ratepayers of the rural districts, as it may well do, it will go to reduce the amount payable by Newport. Suppose, for instance, that it is found to be more economical to provide services for the one combined district than for the two districts separately. That would mean some relief to the rates, and would lessen the burden suffered by the ratepayers owing to losing the rich grounds. In such a case, Newport would only be bound to pay compensation for the lessened burden because that would be the only burden which "will be" in fact incurred by the ratepayers.

- A A complication does arise, however, because the Minister's Order did not simply combine the two rural districts. It carved a piece out of one of them, that is, out of the rural district of Magor, and transferred it to a new urban district of Pontypool. Does this affect the compensation payable by the borough of Newport to the combined rural districts? This is a nice question which can best be considered by asking how a claim by the rural district of Magor alone
- B would have been affected by the subtraction of the piece. The answer is, I think, reasonably plain. On the one hand, if the piece was profitable to the rural district of Magor, in that it brought in more money than it cost, then, if there had been no amalgamation, the loss of that profitable area might provide a ground of claim by the rural district of Magor against Pontypool, but it would not deprive the rural district of Magor of its claim against Newport.
- C The compensation for the increase of burden on the remaining ratepayers of Magor (namely, those left after the district had been shorn of rich grounds both to Newport and to Pontypool) would have to be apportioned between Newport and Pontypool. On the other hand, if the subtracted piece was burdensome for the rural district of Magor in that it cost more than it brought in, then any lessening of the burden on the remaining ratepayers of Magor, because
- D they were well rid of it, would go to reduce the amount payable by Newport. That, I think, follows again from the Godstone case (1), but it must be borne in mind that, in such a case, Pontypool might have a claim against the rural district. Indeed, I see that Pontypool has already been paid £343 as a "financial adjustment." That expense would have to be taken into account before it could be said that the amount payable by Newport should be reduced.
- E To put it shortly, only the net lessening of the burden on the ratepayers would go in relief of Newport.

That seems to me the way in which a proper adjustment could be made on account of the subtracted piece if there had been no amalgamation. Now superimpose the amalgamation on the top of it, and the solution to the whole tangle is this. The new combined rural district council is entitled to compensation

- F from the borough of Newport. The compensation is to be assessed having regard to the fact that the two former rural districts have been amalgamated and have lost a piece to Pontypool, but also that they have had to pay compensation to Pontypool. In that way the arbitrator will ascertain what burden "will be," in fact, incurred by the remaining ratepayers, and he must compare it with what would have been their position if the rural districts had not been
- G shorn of their various grounds or undergone an amalgamation. The rules show that regard must be had to the burden on the ratepayers which would have been incurred "had no alteration of boundaries or other changes taken place," but the total sum which would have been borne by the whole of the former districts must be apportioned so as to show what the ratepayers who are now left would have paid, had there been no change. To put it shortly, a comparison
- H must be made between the number of shillings in the pound which the ratepayers of the present combined rural district will have to pay after the changes and the number of shillings they would have had to pay if there had been no changes, and they are to be compensated for the net increase in the amount which they, as ratepayers, have to pay by reason of the changes. I venture to think that this is not only the sensible solution, but the one provided by the Act of Parliament, and judicially stated in the House of Lords in Newport Borough Council v. Monmouthshire County Council (5): see particularly per VISCOUNT SIMON ([1947] 1 All E.R. 904) and per LORD NORMAND. LORD NORMAND put it very succinctly (ibid., 915):

" . . . the arbitrator's mandate requires him to perform the very simple operation of finding the difference between the burden of the rate-payers in the reduced area in the post-severance period and the burden which they would have borne in the same period if there had been no severance . . . "

My answers to the specific questions are, therefore: (i) Yes; (ii) Yes; (iii*a*) The former; (iii*b*) The latter, but apportioned so as to relate only to the ratepayers who are now left. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I have had the advantage of reading the judgments just delivered by my brethren. I agree with the conclusion and reasoning of my brother COHEN and have very little I wish to add. The decision in Godstone Rural District Council v. Croydon Corpn. (1), though of assistance, does not, I agree, conclude the matter. The wording of the relevant provisions, particularly the first rule of sched. V to the Local Government Act, 1933, seem to me apt to cover a claim by the local authority affected by the alteration of areas and not some other authority into which it has been in whole or in part absorbed. It would appear to make the measure of the sum to be paid the burden on the ratepayers which will be properly incurred by that local authority in meeting the cost of executing its functions and the burden which would have been incurred had no alteration taken place. If the local authority ceases to exist, no burden will be incurred by it. Assuming that its right to compensation can be assigned, this must, as it seems to me, be limited prima facie, at any rate, to the rights which it has, which, if I am right, are to be measured by the extent of its life, if known at the time. I am inclined also to think that if the legislature had intended that these claims would survive total or partial amalgamation or absorption, provision would have been made as to how the matter was to be dealt with. It is said that this conclusion defeats the plain intention of the County of Monmouth Review Order. It may be so, but I do not think it is necessarily so. If claims such as this cannot be made in respect of periods after an amalgamation, that would be a matter to be taken into account when deciding on an amalgamation, which, no doubt, in itself often provides some relief to ratepayers. The point is, I think, a difficult one, but, for the reasons given by COHEN, L.J., and those I have stated, I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

CASE STATED by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for Rye, Sussex.

B The taxpayer's wife was an authoress who owned the copyright in her books and received royalties in respect thereof. In the years 1946-47, 1947-48 and 1948-49 the wife received lump sums in return for the grant by her of the right to reproduce two of her books in the form of cinematograph films. The Crown claimed income tax from the taxpayer in respect of the money so received by his wife under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, case II. The commissioners held that the receipts were of a capital nature, and so did not attract tax. The Crown appealed.

E DANCKWERTS, J., said it was plain that the taxpayer's wife received the sums in question by reason of the fact that she was carrying on the vocation of writer or authoress of books founded on history and that the receipt by her was in the course of carrying on that vocation. That being so, it was no answer to say that the receipts were of a capital nature and so were not chargeable under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, case II. On the contrary, it seemed that, as they had been received by virtue of her work and in the course of her vocation, they were so chargeable.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Cohen, Asquith and Denning, L.JJ.), November 28, 1950.]

Gaming—Promise to pay person money paid by him in respect of gaming contract—Loan to repay lost bets—Term that loan should be applied in payment of betting debt—Gaming Act, 1892 (c. 9), s. 1.

The defendant was indebted to a bookmaking company, of which the plaintiff was the managing director, in the sum of £4,020 in respect of betting transactions. On the plaintiff pressing for payment and threatening to report the defendant to Tattersalls, the defendant asked the plaintiff to lend him the money privately and promised to pay it back in weekly instalments. The plaintiff agreed to the proposal, drew up a letter for signature by the defendant acknowledging the loan and agreeing to repay it by weekly instalments of £80, and sent a clerk of the company to the defendant with the draft letter and a cheque for £4,020 in favour of the defendant. The defendant signed the letter and endorsed the cheque which he handed back to the clerk who paid it into the company's bank account. The defendant repaid £2,160 of the loan. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the balance outstanding, the plaintiff gave evidence to the effect that it was at all times understood that the cheque should be merely endorsed by the defendant and returned for payment into the company's account.

HELD: since there was a stipulation, to be inferred from the circumstances, that the money was to be applied solely in payment of the betting debt to the company, the transaction fell within s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, and the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

APPEAL by the defendant from a decision of SLADE, J., dated July 17, 1950, whereby he held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant £1,860, being the balance of £4,020 lent by the plaintiff to the defendant.

The plaintiff was the managing director and the principal shareholder of Hector Macdonald, Ltd., a company carrying on the business of bookmakers and commission agents. In June, 1949, the defendant, a professional backer of horses, owed the company £4,020 in respect of bets, and at the end of July the plaintiff threatened to report him to Tattersalls. On July 29, during a telephone conversation, the defendant asked the plaintiff whether he could lend him privately the money which he owed to the company, promising that he would pay it back weekly and sign any agreement in connection with the loan which the plaintiff had drawn up. The plaintiff agreed to make the loan and to accept repayment at the rate of £80 a week, and the same day the defendant sent to the plaintiff the first instalment of £80, and requested the plaintiff to forward an agreement for his signature. On July 30 a document, purporting to be written at the defendant's address, was sent by the plaintiff to the defendant. It was in the following terms:

B “ Dear Sir, I beg to acknowledge receipt of cheque value £4,020 by way of loan, which sum I undertake to repay to you by weekly instalments of £80 each on the Monday of each week commencing on Aug. 1 next, and continuing on the Monday of each week thereafter until such time as the whole of the said sum of £4,020 shall have been repaid by me to you . . . ”

C That document, together with a cheque to order for £4,020 in favour of the defendant crossed “ Not negotiable,” was delivered to the defendant by a servant of the company. The defendant signed the document, endorsed the cheque, and handed it back to the company's servant, who paid it into the company's banking account. The defendant repaid £2,160 of the loan, but in and after March, 1950, he failed to make any further payment. SLADE, J., was of opinion that it was neither a term of the oral agreement, nor a term of the contract, if any, for the loan, that the money lent should be applied by the defendant only in discharge of his liability to the company, and, therefore, held that it was not money paid in respect of a wager within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1892, s. 1, and was recoverable by the plaintiff.

E King-Hamilton for the defendant.
 Quass for the plaintiff.

COHEN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of SLADE, J., given on July 17, 1950, by which he decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover £1,860 and costs.

F There is no doubt that the origin of this transaction between the parties was a gaming transaction, but the question is whether, having regard to all the circumstances, the plaintiff is deprived of his right to recover the amount in question by reason of the provisions of s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892. That section provides:

G “ Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845 or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connexion therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money.”

H [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, reviewed the evidence, and continued:] It seems to me that the only possible inference from the evidence given by the plaintiff is that the oral agreement contained an express provision that the moneys received should be applied in discharge of the defendant's obligations to the company, and that the plaintiff took, with the defendant's consent, every possible step to ensure that that obligation was performed. I refer in particular to the plaintiff's evidence in answer to counsel for the defendant in cross-examination.

"Q.—It was at all times the understanding that the cheque should be merely endorsed on the back by Mr. Green [the defendant] and returned for payment into the firm's account? A.—That was exactly his idea. He drew the whole thing up himself."

I would add that he ensured the performance of that obligation by sending the company's servant with the cheque with instructions to await its return as soon as it had been endorsed, and that he then caused it to be paid into the company's account. It seems to me that, in those circumstances, the only possible inference is that it was an express term that the money should be applied in that particular way. If the learned judge thought that to be the right view of the facts, I think he would have agreed with the conclusion which I have reached, because he states the law quite plainly, and I respectfully agree with his statement of it. He says:

"There are two lines of authority. The first is contained in Tatam v. Reeve (1), which was approved by the Court of Appeal in Saffery v. Mayer (2). I understand those authorities to decide that where money is paid at request to discharge losses already incurred in transactions which are null and void within the meaning of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, direct by the person who provides the money to the winner, such money paid at request is money paid 'in respect of' a wager and is, therefore, not recoverable by the person who provides the money from the person who asks him to provide it, by reason of the provisions of s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892."

Then he contrasts that position with the second line of authority, which is represented by the decision of this court in Re O'Shea, Ex p. Lancaster (3), and the learned judge says:

"I understand that case to decide that a person who lends money to another person who has already lost bets for the express purpose of enabling that person to use the money so borrowed to discharge his liability to the winner in respect of those bets, can recover because it is not money paid 'in respect of' a wager."

There, again, I agree with the learned judge's statement as to what was decided in that case.

Before I part with Re O'Shea (3) I ought to refer to an argument which counsel for the plaintiff addressed to us based on some observations of COZENS-HARDY, M.R., where he said ([1911] 2 K.B. 984):

"This court in the case of Ex p. Pyke, Re Lister (4) in the year 1878 drew a distinction to the effect that the money was not lent to the bankrupt to enable him to make a bet, but it was lent to him to pay for a bet which he had already made and lost, and as the law then stood the court held that there was no objection to that, and it took the view that the Act must be construed strictly, and that there was nothing in the earlier Acts to hit the transaction, which was a loan to enable the payment of a bet that had already been made and lost. Now has that law been altered by the Act of 1892? It is said, and the learned registrar seems to have taken that view, that the case was within the language or the spirit of the Queen's Bench decision in Tatam v. Reeve (1), which was approved by the Court of Appeal in Saffery v. Mayer (2). I am unable to accept that view."

It is clear that the Master of the Rolls is approving, within limits, Ex p. Pyke, Re Lister (4) but I read him, not as saying that, if it was a term of the loan that the money should be paid in a particular way, that would not be within the mischief of the Act, but merely as saying that, if there was a loan which the borrower was entitled to deal with as he liked, then it would not be within the mischief of the Act notwithstanding that it was the intention of both parties that it should be applied in a particular way. If that is what he meant, I respectfully agree. If, however, he was intending to say that it would not be within the mischief of the Act, notwithstanding that there was a definite bargain to apply the money in discharging the indebtedness in respect of a wagering transaction, then I think that would be in direct contravention of the Act of 1892.

A After citing Re O'Shea (3) the learned judge goes on to refer to HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, 2nd ed., vol. 15, p. 487, note (p), which is to this effect:

B "In relation to wagers the distinction between money lent and money paid at request appears to be this, that in the case of a loan the money is not paid by the lender 'under or in respect of' a wager, the lender being unconcerned with its application; whereas in the case of a payment by request the money is allocated to a particular purpose, and the payment is 'in respect of' a wager. When, however, the transaction is strictly a loan, and yet hampered with a stipulation that it shall be applied in respect of a wager, the transaction may perhaps stand upon a different footing (cf. Hill v. Fox (5)); at any rate, if the nature of the arrangement between the lender and borrower is such that a payment made by the latter in pursuance of it would in effect be a payment made by the lender, as in Saffery v. Mayer (2)."

C Assuming this to be a loan for the moment, it seems to me that the present case is exactly that contemplated by the note, namely, that there was a stipulation that it should be applied in respect of a wager. In those circumstances, D it is, I think, worth while looking at what was said by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Hill v. Fox (5), although that case deals with a different Act. In that case the headnote reads as follows:

E "The defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff and other persons for money lost by betting on a horse race, applied to the plaintiff for a loan. The plaintiff lent the defendant £2,000 upon the security of a deed, which assigned to the plaintiff certain policies of assurance, and contained a covenant by the defendant to pay the £2,000, and interest. On the settling day the defendant paid the plaintiff his bets out of the £2,000. In an action by the plaintiff on the covenant, the defendant pleaded that the deed was a mortgage security, part of the consideration for which was a gaming debt. At the trial F the judge told the jury that if the £2,000 was advanced in pursuance of a stipulation or agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that out of it the plaintiff should be paid the money which he had won of the defendant by betting it was a mere colourable loan and evasion of the statute; but that if there was no such stipulation or agreement, and the plaintiff advanced the £2,000 as a loan for the defendant to dispose of as he pleased, the deed G was valid, although the plaintiff expected to be paid out of the money so lent. Held, in the Exchequer Chamber, on a bill of exceptions, that the direction was right."

That seems to me exactly the kind of direction which, if the present case had been tried by a jury, the judge should have given to the jury.

H Counsel for the plaintiff did the best he could to support the judgment and he advanced three propositions. He said (i) that the contract was a contract of loan, (ii) that there was no term in that contract that the money should be applied in paying the debt due to the plaintiff's company, and (iii) that, even if he was wrong on the second point, the money was still recoverable. I feel some doubt whether he is right in saying that the contract was a contract of loan having regard to the collateral stipulation, which, in my view, undoubtedly existed, but I will assume in his favour that it was. On that basis I think it is plain, for the reasons I have already given, that it was a term of the contract that the money should be applied in paying the debt due to the company. If that be so, it seems to me that, applying the principle of Hill v. Fox (5), and considering, as I do, that the direction which should have been given to the jury, if there had been one in this case, would be on the same lines as that which was given in Hill v. Fox (5) and approved by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, the money advanced by the plaintiff is irrecoverable because it is within the mischief of s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. The following principles seem to me to be deducible from the authorities. (i) When "X" at the request of a loser of a bet pays the amount of that bet direct to the winner, "X" cannot enforce a promise by the loser to repay him. That is decided in Tatam v. Reeve (1), and the case is directly within the mischief of s. 1 of the Act of 1892, because there one has the promise by the loser to pay a person—that is "X"—a sum of money paid by that person, "X," to the winner in respect of a bet. (ii) Where "X" makes a loan to the loser so as to enable, but not so as to bind, the loser to apply the proceeds by paying the sum lost to the winner, "X" can claim repayment. That is decided in Re O'Shea (3), and, in my view, also in Ex p. Pyke, Re Lister (4). (iii) Where "X" makes a loan to the loser stipulating contractually that the loser can apply it by way of paying the winner the amount of the debt and not otherwise, "X" cannot claim repayment. That is Hill v. Fox (5), from which my Lord quoted.

In my view, this case falls within the third of those three rules. It cannot be gainsaid—here I think counsel for the plaintiff is right—that there was strong evidence that the transaction was one of loan, but the evidence seems to me to establish plainly that the application of the money lent to the payment of the debt to Macdonald, Ltd., was a true term of the contract. That seems to emerge in particular from the two questions which my Lord has quoted and which were put by the learned judge himself to the plaintiff, when he asked him:

"Q.—You do not dispute that you would not have lent the £4,020 except on the terms that it should be used to discharge the defendant's indebtedness to your firm? A.—When Jack Green put it to me the way he did and explained it to me, you are quite correct, my Lord.

"Q.—The whole agreement, according to you, was that the money should be lent, not for him to spend a holiday in the south of France, but to pay the firm? A.—Definitely."

I can only suppose that the learned judge had overlooked the replies to those questions put by himself when he reached the conclusion that it was not a term of the loan that its proceeds should be applied in the way I have indicated. It seems to me clear that both parties would have agreed, if they had been asked, that, if the defendant had kept this cheque instead of endorsing and returning it, the plaintiff would have been entitled to stop it.

Counsel for the plaintiff has relied on the absence of any such express stipulation from the so-called written contract, the letter of July 30. I do not think that that agreement is either exhaustive of the terms of the actual bargain between the parties or that it superseded the original oral agreement made between them, and this last agreement seems to me clearly to have been subject to a stipulation that the money lent should be applied in payment of the bets lost and not otherwise. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: If we were to uphold the decision of SLADE, J., we should present bookmakers with a means of evading the Gaming Acts which would be as effective as Hyams v. Stuart King (6) was until it was overruled by Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane), Ltd. (7). All that a bookmaking company would have to do would be to send a messenger to the backer, with a letter and cheque in favour of the managing director, and get them both returned signed. The transaction in the present case seems to me to fall precisely within the words of the Act of 1892. The money for which the plaintiff sues is money which his bank paid to the bookmaking company in respect of the betting debts which the defendant had incurred. I do not think it matters whether in point of law the plaintiff's claim against the defendant is for money lent or for money paid at the defendant's request. Even if it were disguised in the form of a loan, the substance of it is that the plaintiff paid the defendant's losses and seeks to recover the amount from the defendant. That he cannot do.

Counsel for the plaintiff suggested that Ex p. Pyke (4) was still good law, relying on a dictum of the Master of the Rolls in Re O'Shea (3) ([1911] 2 K.B. 985). I do not think that counsel interpreted the dictum aright, but, in any event, I am clear that since the Act of 1892 Ex p. Pyke (4) is not good law, because the lender there paid the betting debts direct. Counsel for the defendant also said that Tatam v. Reeve (1) must be read with the qualification which FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., put on it in Hyams v. Stuart King (6) ([1908] 2 K.B. 715), namely, there must be a knowledge on the part of the person paying that it is in respect of a betting debt. I agree, but in this case the plaintiff well knew that he was paying the money in respect of betting debts.

The distinction is clear enough. A loan which leaves the borrower at liberty to apply the money as he wishes is not invalidated by the Act of 1892, even though it is contemplated by both parties that he will probably pay betting debts with it, but when a loan is hampered by a stipulation that the money is to be used for payment of a betting debt, then, no matter whether the stipulation is express or implied or to be inferred from the circumstances, the loan is a payment in respect of the betting debt and is hit by the Act. In this case there was a stipulation, to be inferred from the circumstances, that the money was to be applied solely in payment of the betting debt. The statute, therefore, prevents its recovery. I agree with my Lords that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

M. & Co. . . . leaving such small legacies as she knows I wish to be paid and Messrs. M. & Co. to be allowed to charge reasonable fees for the work they do." J.T.M. died soon after the testator's death and probate of the testator's will was granted to E.M.Y. Questions of construction of the will arose, and, in applying to the court for directions, E.M.Y. deposed: "Prior to executing his said will the testator discussed with me the devolution of his estate after my death and I was well aware of his wishes in regard thereto, which were as follows, namely, that T.C. . . . should receive a legacy of £2,000, and that G.S. . . . should receive a legacy of £1,000, and that, subject thereto, his estate should be used to found and endow a home for distressed gentlefolk." T.C. was one of the witnesses who attested the testator's will. The testator's estate consisted of pure personalty and real property. The testator possessed no leasehold property at the date of his death.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, the words "all his worldly goods and chattels both real and personal" included all the deceased's property both real and personal.

Dictum of LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in Grayson v. Atkinson (1752) (1 Wils. K.B. 334), not applied.

(ii) having regard to the imperative terms of the will and especially to the words "it being a condition of this will," the testator intended to impose a trust on his executors with regard to the dispositions of his estate after his widow's death, and notwithstanding that the testator's wishes were not made known to both his executors and that the dispositions were not intended to take effect until after the death of the widow, the trust so created was an effective secret trust established by the affidavit evidence of the widow.

(iii) the gift "for the permanent aid of distressed gentlefolk and similar purposes" was charitable, being for the relief of poor persons, and its charitable nature was unaffected by the reference to "similar purposes."

(iv) although T.C. was an attesting witness, his beneficial interest was not rendered ineffective by the Wills Act, 1837, s. 15, because he was interested under the secret trust and not under the will.

C ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the true nature and effect of dispositions contained in the will of Roger Pilkington Young, deceased. The will is set out in full in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, J.

Raymond Jennings, K.C., and B. S. Tatham for the plaintiff, the testator's widow and executrix.

Harold Christie, K.C., and Plowman for the first four defendants, interested on the testator's intestacy.

D M. J. Albery for the fifth and sixth defendants, who claimed to be entitled by virtue of a trust imposed on the testator's widow by the will.

Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

E DANCKWERTS, J.: The testator died on Dec. 20, 1943, having made his will, dated Apr. 25, 1942, by which he appointed his wife, Eveleen Mary Young, and a solicitor, named John Teddie Marriott, to be his executors. The second executor died very shortly after the testator's death, and, consequently, on Oct. 23, 1944, the testator's will was proved by the widow alone.

F Although the testator left an estate amounting to over £94,000 and possessed an estate of as large an amount as that at the date of the will, he did not think fit to employ the services of experts in the preparation of his will, but undertook that work himself with the usual unfortunate results, that is to say, he has left a will which has caused everybody concerned, including the court, a great deal of trouble in understanding and construing it. It is a short will and it is in these terms:

G "This is the last will and testament of Roger Pilkington Young and is to the effect that he leaves all his worldly goods and chattels both real and personal unto his wife Eveleen Mary Young for her life-time only and he appoints the said Eveleen Mary Young together with John Teddie Marriott of Shortacre Alderley Edge in the county of Cheshire solicitor to be his executors it being a condition of this will that after the testator's death the said Eveleen Mary Young makes a new will leaving Roger Pilkington Young's estate for the purposes she knows he desires it to be used for—for the permanent aid of distressed gentlefolk and similar purposes such will to be held by and administered by Messrs. Marriott & Co. of 10, Norfolk Street Manchester leaving such small legacies as she knows I wish to be paid and Messrs. Marriott & Co. to be allowed to charge reasonable fees for the work they do."

H The first question arises on the first few lines of the will. The only disposition of property in terms by the will is of "all his worldly goods and chattels both real and personal." The testator left comprised in that large estate no lease-holds, which are technically called by the law "chattels real", but he left real estate in the shape of freeholds of the value of about £28,000. The words "worldly goods and chattels" are singularly inappropriate to a gift of freehold land. That great lawyer, LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., in 1752 in Grayson v. Atkinson (1), when faced with provisions of rather a similar character, the words in that case being:

expressed the view that the words "goods and chattels real and personal moveable and immoveable" would not have carried the lands by the law of England but for a context which enabled him to reach a different conclusion. That, however, was mere obiter dicta so far as the decision in that case was concerned, because he had a context which enabled him to reach a different conclusion, and, notwithstanding the great respect I have for LORD HARDWICKE and his decision, it seems to me that, in 1950 and assisted, as I am, by a more liberal meaning given to careless phrases used by a testator in such cases as Perrin v. Morgan (2), I am at liberty to give a more generous meaning to the phrase used in the present will. The impression which is conveyed to me by the phrase, and one to which I feel at liberty to give effect, is that the testator intended to leave to his wife for her life all his property both real and personal even though he included in the description such inapt words as "worldly goods and chattels." Accordingly, I reach the conclusion that, so far as the wife's beneficial interest is concerned, she is entitled for her life to the whole of the testator's estate.

That deals with the first point, but more difficulties are raised by the form of the testator's will. Affidavit evidence has been given by the widow (which I have come to the conclusion is admissible) in the following terms:

"Prior to executing his said will the testator discussed with me the devolution of his estate after my death and I was well aware of his wishes in regard thereto, which were as follows, namely, that the defendant, Thomas Copp, who had been employed by the testator for many years as a chauffeur and general factotum, should receive a legacy of £2,000, and that the defendant, Gerald Summerfield, who was the testator's land agent and personal friend, should receive a legacy of £1,000, and that, subject thereto, his estate should be used to found and endow a home for distressed gentlefolk."

She says she is anxious to give effect to those wishes so far as she lawfully may.

There is, therefore, no doubt what the testator's intentions were. The question is whether he adopted such legal methods that they can be given effect. It is plain that, though there is reference to some will-making power given to the testator's widow, the court may find that there is an executory gift on the death of the widow for the benefit of certain beneficiaries whom the testator intended to benefit. An example of that is to be found in Comiskey v. Bowring-Hanbury (3), though the circumstances of that case are, no doubt, different from those of the present case. First, it is objected that the widow is given an estate after her death, and, therefore, there is nothing here that she could deal with, and she has merely a power of disposing of property. In those circumstances it is not possible to make reference, it is contended, to parol evidence to ascertain something outside the will, as is shown by Re Hetley (4). That seems to me a case which is plainly distinguishable from the present one. In Re Hetley (4) there was, in effect, nothing but a power. In the present case there is to be found in the will something much more definite than any power. Everything which I find in this will is imperative. Once you find the directions in the will are imperative, then they relate to the creation of trusts rather than to the creation of a power. The words in the present will "it being a condition of this will" that something shall be done, plainly, to my mind, point to an imperative trust.

It is said that there is no estate for the widow on which any trusts can be tacked which can be proved by parol evidence. That seems to me not to be the case. It is to be observed that the testator appointed the widow and the solicitor, John Teddie Marriott, to be the executors of the will, and, therefore, on the testator's death, the estate by law vested in those executors although John Teddie Marriott died before they were able to perfect their title by means of the grant of probate. It was also said that the trusts in question, being obviously intended to take effect after Mrs. Young's death, must be ineffective because she could not be a trustee for any purpose after she was dead. At first sight, that seems a reasonable statement. When it is examined, in my view, it is found to be based on a fallacy. Mrs. Young, and, if he had survived, Mr. Marriott, would have been trustees for purposes which were to take effect on the testator's death as soon as the will came into effect. It is quite true they related to future interests and future purposes, but they were none the less trustees for those purposes.

- A A very good example of what is known as a secret trust being founded in that way is to be seen in Re Gardner (5). There the testatrix, by her will dated in 1909, bequeathed all her real and personal estate to her husband for his use and benefit during his life "knowing that he will carry out my wishes." Four days after the date of her will she signed an unattested memorandum expressing her wish that "the money I leave to my husband" should, on his death, be equally divided among certain named beneficiaries. She died in 1919 and her husband died four days later. After the wife's death the memorandum was found in the husband's safe and there was parol evidence that shortly after the execution of the will the testatrix had said, in his presence, that her property after his death was to be equally divided between the named beneficiaries and that he assented thereto. Those were held to be effective trusts binding on his estate. There again, the trusts in question were only operative after the husband was dead, and they were operative in respect of an estate which did not devolve on him by reason of the dispositions contained in the wife's will because she gave him only a life interest. But they were interests which vested in him by virtue of operation of law. Accordingly, it seems to me there is no difficulty in regard to the fact that these trusts are to operate after the death of the widow.

- F The conclusion which I come to is that these trusts are secret trusts which are established by parol evidence given by the widow in her affidavit and that they are effective in respect of this estate. It is to be observed that they were communicated to the wife in the testator's lifetime before the date of the will. They were communicated only to her and not to her co-executor, but, on the authorities, that would have been sufficient to bind the co-executor equally with her if he had survived long enough to obtain grant of probate, so that he was concerned with the operation of the will and the trusts as well as the widow. In Blackwell v. Blackwell (6) I find the principle expressed by LORD WARRINGTON ([1929] A.C. 341):

- H "Further in Moss v. Cooper (7) WOOD, V.-C., said: 'If, on the faith of a promise by A., a gift is made in favour of A. and B., the promise is fastened on to the gift to both, for B. cannot profit by A.'s fraud'."

So, prima facie, it seems to me that here there are secret trusts which should be given effect.

Another objection which is taken, however, is that as Mrs. Young took no beneficial interest after her death she was incapable of making a will as required by the testator. She could not make a will for the testator and she could not leave the property herself because she had no beneficial interest in it. I do not think that is the intention of the testator. It seems to me that what he is doing is to create a trust through the estate which by law vests in the executors for the benefit of the beneficiaries, the names of whom he has communicated to his wife in his lifetime. When he says, "it being a condition of this will" that his wife shall make a new will dealing with the property in the way in which she knows he desires it to be dealt with, what he really has in mind is that, trusts having been created, she is to declare them by her will in the sense that she puts them on record. I can see nothing ineffective in that. That is the result of the directions which are given by the testator, though it may well be that he has not expressed his intentions in a very intelligible manner. One has to examine the will to give effect to the substance of the matter as one finds it in the will.

One other point has regard to the gift "for the permanent aid of distressed gentlefolk and similar purposes." It seems to me that that is a good charitable gift since it is for the relief of poor persons, and the reference to "similar purposes" does not detract from the charitable nature, being controlled by the words which precede the three words "and similar purposes." In the result, I find that the legacies referred to do not fail, and, therefore, I do not think there is any difficulty such as has arisen in some cases where there was a gift for charitable purposes, which would otherwise be valid, of a portion of an estate, and a portion given to purposes which were invalid. If there were any failure, it seems to me that the gift for the charitable purpose would swallow up any part of the estate which was not effectively disposed of otherwise on the principles discussed by JENKINS, J., in Re Coxen (8).

A further point concerns the validity of one of these legacies. The widow has testified that the testator's intention was, as communicated to her, that Copp, who had been employed by the testator for many years as chauffeur and general factotum, should receive a legacy of £2,000. Thomas Copp was one of the two attesting witnesses to the will, and, if he takes the legacy under the terms of the will, the result of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 15, is to make his legacy ineffective. But, does he take the legacy under the will? Counsel for the next-of-kin has referred me to Re Fleetwood (9), a case of a secret trust, decided in 1880 by HALL, V.-C. In that case, undoubtedly, it was held that as a lady who was intended to be a beneficiary, Miss Mary Head, was one of the attesting witnesses to the fourth codicil, the trust for her failed as to her beneficial interest, as it would have done, as HALL, V.-C., said, had the trust been declared in the codicil. It appears, however, that the matter was not argued in that case, which was concerned with the decision of many other points, and it seems to me that it is contrary to principle. The whole theory of the formation of a secret trust is that the Wills Act, 1837, has nothing to do with the matter, because the forms required by the Wills Act are entirely disregarded in effect, the persons who take beneficially taking, not by virtue of the gift in the will, which is made to a trustee, but by virtue of the secret trusts which are imposed on the apparent beneficiary who does, in fact, take under the will. In the Irish case, O'Brien v. Condon (10), SIR ANDREW PORTER, M.R., had to consider the matter with Re Fleetwood (9) before him. He points out in a judgment which seems to me, if I may respectfully say so, to be entirely in accordance with principle and common sense, that Re Fleetwood (9) was inconsistent with the principle of the matter and inconsistent with certain other cases, one of which was a decision of the House of Lords on an Irish appeal, viz., Cullen v. A.-G. for Ireland (11) decided in 1886. SIR ANDREW PORTER, M.R., pointed out that the point was not argued before HALL, V.-C., in Re Fleetwood (9), and, accordingly, he decided to differ from the decision in Re Fleetwood (9) and apply what seems to me to be the proper statement of the principle. I agree with that Irish decision and I think it is right for me to follow it in the circumstances of this case, because I think that the matter was not properly argued before HALL, V.-C., and I think his judgment on this particular point was given per incuriam. In accordance with the decision in Cullen v. A.-G. for Ireland (11), and the later decision in Re Gardner (12), every consideration connected with the principle of the matter requires me to reach the conclusion that a beneficiary under a secret trust does not take under the will, and, therefore, is not affected by the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 15. Accordingly, the legacy, though given in an indirect manner and intended for Thomas Copp, is effective and he has not forfeited it.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Solicitors: Foyer, White & Prescott, agents for Dunning, Rundle & Stamp, Honiton (for the plaintiff and the fifth and sixth defendants); Corner & Co. (for the first four defendants); Treasury Solicitor.

R. v. FAITHFUL.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), November 21, 1950.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Committal to quarter sessions by court of summary jurisdiction—Duty of quarter sessions to ascertain whether appeal against conviction pending—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 29 (1).

On Aug. 30, 1950, the applicant was committed, under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 29 (1), to the County of London Quarter Sessions for sentence on his conviction of larceny by a metropolitan magistrate, and on Sept. 8 he was sentenced to three years' corrective training. On Sept. 11 he gave notice of appeal to the quarter sessions against his conviction, and on Oct. 5 the appeal was dismissed.

HELD: (i) an appeal committee of quarter sessions which meet frequently, before passing sentence on an offender after a committal under s. 29 (1), should satisfy themselves that the time for appealing against the conviction has expired. If the time for appealing has not expired and the offender informs them that he intends to appeal, the committee should adjourn consideration of the sentence.

(ii) an appeal committee which do not meet so frequently, before passing sentence in any case in which the time for appealing against conviction has not expired, should ascertain whether the offender intends to appeal. If he informs them he intends to appeal, the committee should offer an adjournment and inform the offender of the possible delay and that he must remain in custody.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against sentence. The facts appear in the judgment.

The applicant did not appear and was not represented.

BYRNE, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. On Aug. 30, 1950, the applicant was convicted by a metropolitan magistrate of larceny and was committed to the County of London Quarter Sessions for sentence under s. 29 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. On Sept. 8 he was sentenced to three years' corrective training by the deputy chairman. On Sept. 9 he gave notice of appeal to this court against that sentence, and on Sept. 11 he gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions against his conviction by the magistrate. On Oct. 5 that appeal was heard by the appeal committee of quarter sessions and was dismissed. Thus, it is seen that the applicant's appeal against conviction was heard and disposed of after he had been committed for sentence and had been sentenced. That, in the view of this court, is an undesirable state of affairs. It results from a difficulty which has arisen by reason of the new legislation, and this court desires to make one or two observations with regard to the correct procedure to be adopted.

In the case of appeal committees which meet frequently, such as the appeal committees of the County of London Sessions or of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions or various appeal committees of quarter sessions in the north of England, the appeal committee, before passing sentence on a committal under s. 29 (1) should satisfy themselves that the time for appealing against the conviction has expired. If the time has not expired, the appeal committee should inquire whether the offender intends to appeal, and, if he says he does so intend, they should adjourn the question of sentence. In the case of an appeal committee which does not meet so frequently, if the time for appealing against the conviction has not expired, it is desirable that they should ascertain before passing sentence whether the offender proposes to appeal. If he says he intends to appeal, they should offer an adjournment and warn the offender of the delay that may take place before the appeal against conviction is heard and inform him that they cannot grant bail.

The present application is without merit, and, in the view of the court, the sentence of three years' corrective training was a proper sentence.

Appeal dismissed.
